LUKE, J. Alexander, as receiver of the Irish-American Bank, sued Morrison upon four promissory notes. The defendant filed pleas admitting the execution of the notes, denying the indebtedness thereon as alleged, and pleaded partial payment. He pleaded further that, while one of the notes sued on was payable to the Irish-American Bank, it was not in fact the property of the Irish-American Bank, but was the property of the Industrial Lumber Company, and further that while one of the notes was payable to the Irish-American Bank, it was the property of the Citizens' & Southern Bank, and further that one of the notes showed that collateral had been given to secure it, and that no diligence was used by the plaintiff to collect the collateral pledged to secure the note sued on, and that he, the defendant, was damaged thereby more than the amount sued for. The plea was amended several times, and some of the amendments were stricken on motion of the plaintiff, and in some instances the defendant yielded to the court's judgment in striking parts of the plea or amendments, by further amending to meet the objections urged by the plaintiff. The defendant having admitted the execution of the notes sued on, and having admitted that he had received notice claiming attorney's fees, assumed the burden of proof. After the defendant had concluded his evidence, the court, upon motion of the plaintiff, directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for a part of the sums sued for. The defendant excepts to this judgment, as well as to the rulings of the court in striking certain amendments to his plea, in allowing certain testimony, in not submitting to the jury certain alleged issues, and in refusing a certain request to charge.

[1-3] Held: It was not error for the court to direct the verdict complained of against the defendant, the verdict so directed, as matter of law, having been demanded; nor did the court err in any of the rulings complained of in the bill of exceptions.

[4] The plea by which the defendant sought to deny that ownership of one of the notes was in the Irish-American Bank was not sustained by proof in any particular. The note was made payable to the Irish-American Bank, and there was no proof of any fraud in the procurement of the note; neither did the plea allege fraud; there was nothing alleged nor proven which negated the presumption that the plaintiff was the bona fide holder and owner of note. See Civil Code 1910, §§ 4288, 4290.

[5] In addition to what has just been said, in a suit like the present one, by a receiver of a bank, suing for the use of the bank, on a promissory note payable to the bank, wherein the execution of the note is admitted, a plea that the bank was not the holder or owner of the note should be stricken on demurrer, where it does not appear that inquiry as to ownership of the note was necessary, etc. See Mayer v. Thomas, 97 Ga. 772, 25 S. E. 761. We have carefully examined the record in the instant case, and the judgment of the court upon each of the questions involved was correct. The assignment of error upon the refusal of the court to charge cannot be considered, as it does not appear that it was presented in writing. There is no merit in any of the assignments of error.

Judgment affirmed.

BENTON TRANSFER CO. v. MARION NAT. BANK. (No. 11846.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Bills and notes \S 330—Indorsement on note held a sufficient indorsement to give holder rights of bona fide holder.

The words, "For value received we hereby assign, transfer, and set over to the M. Bank all our rights, title, and interest in and to the within note and in and to the said * * * trucks for which this note was executed," written on the back of a promissory note and signed by the payee, was a sufficient indorsement to give the transferee the rights of a bona fide holder.

2. Bills and notes \S 369—Claim against payee for breach of agreement in contract of sale not available against bona fide holder.

Under Civ. Code 1910, § 4286, relative to the rights of bona fide holders of promissory notes, it was not a defense to an action by a bona fide holder that the payee in selling a motortruck to the maker agreed to maintain a service station and service truck in the maker's city and had broken such agreement, especially where the defense was not connected with the transaction out of which the note grew.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by the Marion National Bank against the Benton Transfer Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The action was on a promissory note executed by defendant to the Indiana Truck Corporation September 10, 1917, and, before maturity, transferred to plaintiff for value by the form of indorsement quoted in the opinion. The answer alleged that this was a mere assignment, and that plaintiff took the note subject to all defenses and equities to which it was subject in the hands of the payee, that the truck corporation sold plaintiff a truck on October 17, 1918, and agreed in the contract to maintain a service station and service truck in Savannah during the life of the truck sold, that it failed to do so, that such failure deprived plaintiff of the use of its trucks purchased from the truck corporation for 73 days at different times, and that the reasonable market value of the use of the trucks was $20 a day.—Statement by editor.

[2] 2. The defenses attempted to be set up not coming within any of the provisions of section 4286 of the Civil Code of 1910, the trial court did not err in striking them and in directing a verdict for the plaintiff, especially in view of the fact that in this case the pleadings showed that the defense relied upon was in no wise connected with the transaction out of which grew the note sued on.

ELBERTON & E. R. CO. v. NEWSOM.
(No. 11724.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2,
March 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Appeal and error \S 719(1)—Error must be assigned on exceptions pendente lite.

Exceptions pendente lite cannot be considered, unless error is assigned thereon either in the main bill of exceptions or in the Supreme Court by counsel for plaintiff in error before the argument begins.

2. Master and servant \S 291(6) — Pleadings held not to authorize charge on duty to select servants.

Pleadings, in an action by a servant for personal injuries, held not to authorize a charge that "the master is bound to exercise ordinary care in the selection of servants, and not to retain them after knowledge of incompetency."

3. Trial \S 194(20)—Instruction as to duty of jurors, where defendant rebutted presumption of negligence, erroneous.

In servant's action for injuries, it was error to charge that if defendant rebutted the presumption of negligence, "then it would be left entirely to the minds and consciences of enlightened jurors as to whether or not the plaintiff would be entitled to recover in any amount in this case."

4. Damages \S 216(8)—An instruction in personal injury case as to a method of arriving at present cash value of lost earning capacity held erroneous and confusing.

In action for personal injury, a charge as to the method of arriving at the present cash value of the recovery for lost earning capacity held erroneous and confusing.

Error from City Court of Washington; C. E. Sutton, Judge.

Action by J. N. Newsom against the Elberton & Eastern Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The petition alleged as follows:

"Third. That about 7 o'clock a. m. of said date petitioner was ordered by defendant to make a trip of inspection over defendant's railroad on a motorcar to safeguard an east-bound passenger train, because the track was dangerous and defective; the roadbed being new, wet, and insufficient to safely carry the trains operated over it at that time.

"Fourth. That petitioner responded to the orders of defendant, but objected to making said trip over said railroad in its dangerous condition, but got up a crew of five men and the only motorcar available, which appeared to be in good and safe condition, but when petitioner had gone about 6 miles from Washington, and while he was still in Wilkes county and was traveling at the rate of about 8 or 10 miles an hour, said motorcar mounted the rail to the left, left the railroad track, and came to a sudden stop, and threw petitioner in front of the car between the rails on the ties, with several of the laborers on top of him. * * *

"Fifth. That defendant was negligent in numerous and divers ways which contributed to the injury of petitioner, and especially negligent because it furnished petitioner with a defective and broken motorcar to be used in going over its railroad. * * *

"Sixth. That defendant, through its agents and servants, had removed from said motorcar a set of good wheels, axle, and equipment, and put in their place the defective wheels, axle, and equipment as aforesaid, and had left said motorcar on one of its tracks as if in good condition and ready for use, and said defective condition of said motorcar was so obscure that petitioner could not discover the defects; and there was no duty of inspection of said motorcar upon petitioner, and the first knowledge he had of its defective condition and its insufficiency for use was when said motorcar left the railroad track and threw him between the rails on the cross-ties and rails, and injured and damaged him as herein shown.

"Seventh. That defendant was negligent: (d) Because said motorcar was set up on a track in position to be operated while it had under it a defective wheel, spindle, and axle, and allowed to be used with several rollers lost or removed from the journal of said car, which was a latent defect known to defendant, or which should have been known to defendant by inspection, but which was unknown to petitioner, and there was no duty upon petitioner to know of said latent defect."

Amendment to Petition.

"Now comes J. N. Newsom, plaintiff in above stated case, and amends his petition of file as follows:

"(1) Amending the third paragraph of said petition by inserting in the second line thereof, and between the words 'defendant' and 'to,' the following, to wit: 'Through its general manager, C. L. Wickersham.'

"(2) Amending paragraph 6 of said petition by adding to the end of the first line thereof the following, to wit: 'A. C. Pounds, one of defendant's track foremen.'

"(3) Amending paragraph 7(d) of said petition by inserting in the second line thereof, between the words 'operator' and 'while,' the following, to wit: 'By defendant through its servants Mose Ferrell, Bollin Willis, Loyd Jones, Bosie Coleman, and Paul McLendon.'"

The court charged:

"That will be a question for you to arrive at, as to what the plaintiff's expectancy will be, taking into consideration his age and manner of living, his present health, his increase in wages or decrease in wages, the reduction of his earning capacity, or any other matter satisfactory to yourselves, taking into consideration these rules of law which I have given you in charge and the evidence given you as to whether his wages might be increased by his increased ability, in determining what the plaintiff's loss under this item of damages would be—that is, lost earning capacity, past, present, and future."

"When you arrive at the number of years he would be entitled to live, and when you determine the wages or earning capacity of the plaintiff in the case, then you would multiply the number of years of the plaintiff's expectancy by his earning capacity, using any method suitable to yourselves, and figuring on a basis of 7 per cent. interest, and in this manner you would arrive at a lump sum, which would be the item of damages caused by the lost earning capacity, past, present, and future."

"In any event, gentlemen of the jury, you will not reach separate items of damages, but you will take into consideration the previous item of pain and suffering, present, past, and future, and combine the two items, and in the event you do find for the plaintiff, combining your computations on the basis of 7 per cent. interest, you would render your verdict for one lump sum, which would cover the entire damages in the case."

"I charge you that in computing the items of damages in this case, past, present, and future damages, that you can use any method practicable to yourselves, figure it on an interest basis of 7 per cent., and reduce the damages to a present cash value."—Statement by editor.

Calloway & Howard, of Augusta, and W. A. Slaton, of Washington, Ga., for plaintiff in error.

Hill & Adams, of Atlanta, and L. D. McGregor, of Warrenton, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. [1] 1. Exceptions pendente lite cannot be considered unless error is assigned thereon, either in the main bill of exceptions or in this court by counsel for plaintiff in error, before the argument begins. In the instant case, there is no assignment of error on the exceptions pendente lite. The ruling complained of, having been made some several months before the bill of exceptions was presented, cannot be considered. See Shaw v. Jones Newton & Co., 133 Ga. 446, 66 S. E. 240; Ponder v. State, 25 Ga. App. 768, 105 S. E. 318.

[2] 2. Neither the pleadings nor the evidence raised an issue which would authorize the charge (complained of in ground 2 of the Amendment to the motion for a new trial) that—

"The master is bound to exercise ordinary care in the selection of servants, and not to retain them after knowledge of incompetency."

[3] 3. It was error to charge the jury that—

If the defendant rebutted the presumption of negligence, "then it would be left entirely to the minds and consciences of enlightened jurors as to whether or not the plaintiff would be entitled to recover in any amount in this case."

[4] 4. The charge of the court, as complained of, upon the measure of damages, was erroneous; and in the court's effort to correct the erroneous charge the jury was still left confused as to the method of arriving at the present cash value of his recovery, if he was entitled to recover.

5. There were many inaccuracies in the charge of the court which are not here dealt with, but they are such inaccuracies as will not likely recur upon another trial of the case. It was error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

HARDWICK v. FIGGERS. (No. 11765.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Municipal corporations \S 706(1)—Petition for damages from horse shying at object permitted to fall in street held not demurrable.

In an action for damages to plaintiff's horse and buggy, alleged to have been caused by his horse shying at a bale of cotton falling from defendant's dray, and plunging into the side of an automobile, petition held not subject to general demurrer.

2. Municipal corporations \S 706(6)—In action for damages from fright of horse at bale of cotton left in street, questions held for jury.

Whether defendant's employee was negligent in permitting bales of cotton to fall from his dray on a street, or in permitting them to remain there an undue and unreasonable length of time, whether such bales showing white splotches were calculated to frighten an ordinary roadworthy horse, and whether such negligence constituted the proximate cause of the horse shying and running into an automobile, were questions for the jury.

3. Negligence \S 59—Rule as to proximate cause stated.

Where a wrongful act puts other forces in operation, resulting in injury to another, which the jury may be authorized to say were the direct, natural, and probable consequences of the original act of negligence, the wrongdoer can be held liable, but where the resultant injuries could not reasonably be foreseen as natural, reasonable, and probable consequences, there can be no recovery.

4. Negligence \S 113(1)—Contributory negligence need not be negatived.

Ordinarily, plaintiff's contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, of which defendant can avail himself by proper proof, but it is not the general rule that one seeking to recover for another's negligence must, by his petition, negative lack of care on his own part.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by Jake Figgers against C. E. Hardwick. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The petition alleged that an employee of the defendant hauling cotton with one of defendant's vehicles allowed three bales to fall in the street; that the bagging of one of them was torn so as to show a white splotch, and formed such an object as naturally tended to frighten an ordinary roadworthy horse that petitioner was driving along such street at a rate of speed of from six to eight miles an hour, on the right side of the street; that his horse was an ordinary roadworthy horse with normal proclivities; that it suddenly shied from such cotton and plunged into an automobile, injuring the horse and breaking the buggy. It sought to recover the cost of repairing the buggy, the amount paid a veterinarian for treating the horse, and the loss of the reasonable hire of the horse. It alleged that defendant was negligent in not tying or bracing the cotton so that it would not fall from the dray, in overloading the dray so that it would fall off, and not keeping a lookout to prevent it from falling and replace it after falling, in allowing the cotton to remain on the street, in not removing it, in permitting it to remain when of such a nature as to frighten horses, and in placing no light on the cotton.

Hugh M. Gannon and Lee Cotton, both of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

H. Mercer Jordan and David S. Atkinson, both of Savannah, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. [1,2] 1. The petition was not subject to general demurrer. Whether the defendant was negligent in permitting the bales of cotton to fall from the dray upon the city streets, whether he was negligent in permitting them to there remain for an undue and unreasonable length of time, whether such bales of cotton, showing the white sample splotches, when left at night in such an unusual place, were calculated to frighten an ordinary roadworthy horse, were all questions of fact, which were properly left to the determination of the jury. In like manner, under the allegations of the petition, it was for the jury to say whether the negligence of the defendant, if it was negligence, constituted the proximate cause of the runaway and injury. Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Hartley, 25 Ga. App. —, 103 S. E. 259 (1); Ga. Ry. & Power Co. v. Ryan, 24 Ga. App. 288 (1), 100 S. E. 713. "The most generally accepted theory of causation * * * is that of natural and probable consequences." Mayor & Council of Macon v. Dykes, 103 Ga. 847, 848, 31 S. E. 443.

[3] Thus, where a wrongful act puts other forces in operation, resulting in injury to another, which the jury might be authorized to say were the direct, natural, and probable consequences of the original act of negligence, the wrongdoer can be held liable on the theory of his responsibility for the first efficient cause. Where, however, as in the case just cited, the resultant injuries could not reasonably be foreseen as the natural, reasonable, and probable consequences of the original wrongful act, there can be no recovery.

[4] 2. Ordinarily, contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff is an affirmative defense of which the defendant can avail himself by proper proof; but it is not the general rule that one who seeks to recover for the negligence of another is required to negative, by his petition, such lack of care on his own part. Great Cosmopolitan Shows v. Petty, 7 Ga. App. 236, 237, 66 S. E. 624; Fisher Motor Car Co. v. Seymour & Allen, 9 Ga. App. 465 (1), 71 S. E. 764.

3. The verdict was authorized by the evidence.

DEVEREAUX v. STATE. (No. 12030.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 8, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Criminal law §1129(6)—Error as to exceptions pendente lite must be assigned in main bill of exceptions on exceptions pendente lite.

Before exceptions pendente lite can be considered by the appellate court, error must have been originally assigned in the main bill of exceptions on the exceptions pendente lite, and not merely on the judgment complained of in the exceptions pendente lite, or such an assignment must be made by the permission of the appellate court before the argument of the case there.

2. Highways §186—Evidence as to building on side of road held competent in prosecution for speeding around curve.

In a prosecution for unlawfully operating a motor vehicle at a greater speed than 10 miles an hour on approaching and traversing a sharp curve, court did not err in permitting solicitor to ask witness, "What was on the left and right hand side?" and witness to answer, "There was a building on the side of the road," as against an objection that it was irrelevant and immaterial, and illustrating no issue of the case, and could in no way show the sharpness of the curve.

3. Highways §186—Testimony as to inability to see around curve held admissible in prosecution for speeding around curve.

In a prosecution for unlawfully operating a motor vehicle at a greater speed than 10 miles an hour on approaching and traversing a sharp curve, court did not err in permitting solicitor to ask witness, "Could you see around the curve?" and the witness to answer, "No, on account of a building," as against an objection that the question and answer were irrelevant, immaterial, and illustrated no issue in the case, and could in no way show sharpness of the curve.

4. Highways §186—Testimony as to how far one could see on bed of road admissible in prosecution for speeding around curve.

In a prosecution for speeding around a curve, there was no error in asking a witness, "Standing where the curve begins, how far can you see on the bed of the road?" or "Disregarding any building, or other obstructions, and standing at the beginning of curve, how far can you see on the bed of the road?" and the witness answering, "Twenty feet," and "About twenty feet," as against objection that the questions and answers were irrelevant, immaterial, and illustrating no issue in the case, and could in no way show the sharpness of the curve.

5. Highways §186—In prosecution for speeding around curve, testimony as to length of curve held admissible.

In a prosecution for speeding around a curve, there was no error in asking a witness, "In traversing the curve, you go about how many feet before entering stretch of the road?" and the witness answering thereto, "Seventy-five feet."

6. Highways §186—Witnesses §248(2)—Testimony as to condition of road admissible in prosecution for speeding around curve.

In a prosecution for speeding around a curve, court did not err in permitting solicitor to ask witness, "What is the condition of the road?" and the answer thereto, "It curves," as against an objection that the question and answer were irrelevant, and could in no way show the sharpness of the curve, and that the answer was not responsive to the question propounded.

7. Criminal law §437, 444—Court did not err in admitting diagram of road made by witness while on stand.

In a prosecution for operating a motor vehicle at a greater speed than 10 miles per hour on approaching and traversing a sharp curve, court did not err in admitting in evidence a diagram of the road, made by a witness for the state while on the stand, as against an objection that the diagram was not made by an expert, was only an opinion of the witness, was not made on the scene, nor from data and figures made by witness at scene, nor according to scale, and was not proven to be correct.

8. Criminal law §1160—Approved verdict, supported by evidence, not disturbed on appeal.

A verdict in a criminal case, approved by the trial judge, will not be interfered with on appeal, where there was evidence to support it.

Error from City Court of Macon; Will Gunn, Judge.

Willie Devereaux was convicted of unlawfully operating a motor vehicle at a greater speed than 10 miles per hour at a sharp curve, and brings error. Affirmed.

Some of the grounds of the amended motion for new trial were as follows:

(1) Because the defendant contends the court erred in admitting over the objection of the defendant's counsel the following question and answer of Wilse Birdsong, a witness for the state; said question being propounded by the solicitor: "Q. What was on the left and right hand side of the road? A. There was a building on the side of the road." Movant objected to the admission of said evidence at the time the same was offered, upon the ground that said question and answer were irrelevant, immaterial, and illustrated no issue in the case, and could in no way show the sharpness of the curve, which objection the court overruled, and in so doing, defendant contends, committed an error prejudicial to the defendant.

(2) Because the defendant contends the court erred in admitting over the objection of the defendant's counsel the following question and answer of Wilse Birdsong, a witness for the state; said question being propounded by the solicitor: "Q. Could you see around the curve? A. No; on the account of a building." Movant objected to the admission of said evidence at the time the same was offered, upon the ground that said question and answer were irrelevant, immaterial, and illustrated no issue in the case, and could in no way show the sharpness of the curve, which objection the court overruled, and in doing so, defendant contends, committed an error prejudicial to the defendant.

(3) Because the defendant contends the court erred in admitting over the objection of the defendant's counsel the following question and answer of Wilse Birdsong, a witness for the state; said question being propounded by Hon. Will Gunn, presiding judge at the trial: "Q. Standing where the curve begins, how far can you see on the bed of the road? A. Twenty feet." Movant objected to the admission of said evidence at the time the same was offered, upon the ground that said question and answer were irrelevant, immaterial, and illustrated no issue in the case, and could in no way show the sharpness of the curve.

(4) Because the defendant contends the court erred in admitting over the objecting of the defendant's counsel the following question and answer of Wilse Birdsong, a witness for the state; said question being propounded by Hon. Will Gunn, presiding judge at the trial: "Q. Disregarding any building or other obstacles, and standing at the beginning of curve, how far can you see on the bed of the road? A. About twenty feet." Movant objected to the admission of said evidence at the time the same was offered, upon the ground that said question and answer were irrelevant, immaterial, and illustrated no issue in the case, and could in no way show the sharpness of the curve, which objection the court overruled, and in doing so, defendant contends, committed an error prejudicial to the defendant.

(5) Because the defendant contends the court erred in admitting over the objection of the defendant's counsel the following question and answer of Wilse Birdsong, a witness for the state; said question being propounded by Hon. Will Gunn, presiding judge at the trial: "Q. In traversing the curve, you go about how many feet before entering a stretch of the road? A. Seventy-five feet." Movant objected to the admission of said evidence at the time the same was offered, upon the ground that said question and answer were irrelevant, immaterial, and illustrated no issue in the case, and could in no way show the sharpness of said curve.

(6) Because the defendant contends the court erred in admitting over the objection of the defendant's counsel the following question and answer of Wilse Birdsong, a witness for the state; said question being propounded by the solicitor: "Q. What is the condition of the road? A. It curves." Movant objected to the admission of said evidence at the time same was offered, upon the ground that said question and answer were irrelevant, immaterial, and illustrate no issue in the case, and could in no way show the sharpness of the curve, and further on the ground that the answer was not responsive to question propounded.

(7) Because the court erred in admitting over the objection of the defendant's counsel, a diagram of the road made by Wilse Birdsong, a witness for the state, while on the stand. Movant objected to the admission of said diagram at the time the same was offered, upon the following grounds, to wit: (a) Because said diagram was not made by an expert. (b) Because said diagram was only an opinion of the witness. (c) Because said diagram was not made on the scene, but from memory only. (d) Because said diagram was not made by witness from data and figures made by the witness at the scene of the curve. (e) Because said diagram was not made to scale. (f) Because said diagram was irrelevant, immaterial, and illustrated no issue in the case. (g) Because said diagram was not proven to be a correct representation of the curve, nor a correct diagram of the road at the place of the said curve. (h) Because said diagram was not proven to be a correct representation of the curve at the time the offense was alleged to have been committed by defendant.

BLOODWORTH, J. An accusation charged that the defendant unlawfully operated a motor vehicle upon a public highway "at a greater speed than ten miles per hour upon approaching a sharp curve and traversing said sharp curve." A demurrer to the accusation was overruled and exceptions pendente lite were filed. This ruling and the overruling of the defendant's motion for a new trial are assigned as error in the main bill of exceptions. Held:

[1] 1. "Before exceptions pendente lite can be considered by this court, error must have been originally assigned in the main bill of exceptions upon the exceptions pendente lite, and not merely upon the judgment complained of in the exceptions pendente lite, or such an assignment must be made, by the permission of this court, before the argument of the case here. Jones v. Ragan, 136 Ga. 653, 71 S. E. 1098; Sovereign Camp of Woodmen of the World v. Warner, 25 Ga. App. 449, 103 S. E. 861; Carhart v. Mackle, 25 Ga. App. —, 103 S. E. 855." Ponder v. State, 25 Ga. App. 768, 105 S. E. 818 (1). Under this ruling the exceptions pendente lite in this case cannot be considered.

[2-7] 2. None of the grounds of the motion for a new trial points out any error that would authorize the grant of a new trial.

[8] 3. There was evidence to support the verdict, it is approved by the trial judge, and this court will not interfere.

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Bills and notes §518(1)—Failure of consideration not shown by evidence.

In action against drawer of a check indorsed by payee to plaintiff, evidence held insufficient to sustain defense of failure of consideration.

2. Bills and notes §370—Evidence as to failure of consideration not admissible, where plaintiff was bona fide holder.

In action against drawer of a check indorsed by payee to plaintiff, exclusion of testimony of defendant in respect to failure of consideration for which he had given check to payee was proper, where there was no sufficient evidence to overcome presumption that plaintiff was a bona fide holder for value before maturity.

3. Bills and notes §459—Not error to refuse to compel making indorser of a check a party defendant.

In action against drawer of a check indorsed by payee to plaintiff, it was not error to refuse to compel plaintiff to make the payee as indorser a party defendant to the action.

Action by the Wrens Motor Company against W. J. Murphree. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. R. Sims, sworn for the defendant, testified as follows:

I am one of the partners composing the firm known as the Wrens Motor Company, which firm is the plaintiff in this case. The Wrens Motor Company purchased this check (referring to the check subsequently admitted in evidence and hereinafter fully set out and described) from Mr. A. W. Williams for a valuable consideration. I do not know exactly when this purchase was made, but when I received the check I was acting in the capacity of the representative of the Wrens Motor Company, and it is my custom to deposit all checks received by me in this capacity not later than two days after the same come into my possession, and therefore I believe this check was purchased by the Wrens Motor Company on or about December 21, 1918.

Defendant offered in evidence without objection from plaintiff, the following check:

$185.00. Louisville, Ga., Nov. 15th, 1918.

Bank of Louisville: Pay to the order of A. W. Williams one hundred and eighty-five dollars.
W. J. Murphree.

Indorsed on back:

A. W. Williams.

Wrens Motor Co., by J. R. Sims.

Pay to the order of any bank, banker, or trust company, all previous indorsements guaranteed. Dec. 23, 1918, Citizens' Bank, Wrens, Ga., ——— Cashier.

First National Bank, Louisville, Ga., W. B. Sinquefeld, Cashier.

Attached thereto:

Payment stopped by drawer. Bank of Louisville, Ga.

The court refused to permit defendant as witness to testify in respect to the consideration for which witness had signed and delivered the check to A. W. Williams, the court refused to permit witness to testify that the consideration supporting the check sued upon had failed either in whole or in part, the court would not permit witness to testify in reference to any defense that witness may have had against A. W. Williams as the payee of the check sued upon, and the court ruled that the defendant had not overcome the presumption that the plaintiff was a bona fide purchaser of the check, for value, without notice, and before maturity, and therefore could not be let in to his defense against the payee, A. W. Williams, or set up such defense against the plaintiff.

The amended motion for new trial was based on the following grounds:

(1) Because the court erred in refusing to abate the suit until A. W. Williams, the indorser of the check sued upon, could be made a party defendant in said case.

(2) Because the court erred in refusing to compel the plaintiff to make A. W. Williams, the indorser of the check sued upon, a party defendant in said case.

(3) Because the court erred in refusing to allow the defendant, W. J. Murphree, to testify that the consideration supporting the check sued upon had failed, either in whole or in part.

(4) Because the court erred in repelling all testimony which tended to establish that the consideration supporting the check sued upon had failed either in whole or in part.

(5) Because the court erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff in the said case.

—Statement by editor.

W. T. Revell and Phillips & Abbot, all of Louisville, for plaintiff in error.

M. C. Barwick, of Louisville, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. [1] 1. Suit was brought by Wrens Motor Company against Murphree upon a check drawn upon a bank, payable to one Williams, and by Williams indorsed in blank to Wrens Motor Company. Murphree admitted a prima facie case in the plaintiff, and assumed the burden of proving a defense of failure of consideration. The evidence was not sufficient to legally carry the burden, and the verdict in favor of the plaintiff was demanded.

[2, 3] 2. The special grounds of the motion for a new trial, wherein the defendant complains of rulings upon the admissibility of evidence, and of the court's refusal to compel the plaintiff to make the indorser upon the check a party defendant, are without merit. See Bedell v. Scarlett, 75 Ga. 56. For no reason assigned was it error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

JOINER v. WILDES. (No. 11909.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1
March 8, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1005(3)—Approved verdict on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Where the jury found a verdict for plaintiff on conflicting evidence and the verdict was approved by the trial court, it will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Witnesses \S 236(1)—Question to plaintiff as to whether amount of items and credits were all right held proper.

In an action on an open account, it was not improper for plaintiff's counsel to call her attention to each item and credit of the account, and ask her if they were all right, the objection being that testimony was coming from the attorney.

3. Limitation of actions \S 54(2)—Not error under evidence to deny motion to strike items of account from petition.

In an action on an open account in which the evidence showed that plaintiff furnished board to defendant, and payments were made in merchandise and money, it was not error to deny motion to strike items of account from petition the motion being based on theory that the account was not a mutual one and that limitations had run.

4. Limitation of actions \S 200(1)—Charge on mutual account held sustained by the evidence.

In an action on an open account in which it was shown that plaintiff furnished board to defendant, and that he made payments therefor in money and merchandise, a charge, relative to limitations, on mutual account, held applicable.

Error from City Court of Valdosta; J. G. Cranford, Judge.

Action by Mrs. W. M. Wildes against J. P. Joiner. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The amended motion for new trial was based on the following grounds:

(1) Because the court erred in permitting the plaintiff, Mrs. W. M. Wildes, on the direct examination, to testify as follows: "Plaintiff's counsel asked the witness the following question: 'Mrs. Wildes, I will ask you if these amounts are all right, a balance due on board of $23 in 1915?' Answer: 'Yes, sir'—and so on as to every item in the account and every credit shown thereon, through May, 1918, as to debits and through May, 1917, as to credits; counsel for defendant then and there objecting to the admission of said evidence on the ground that the testimony should come from the witness, and not from the plaintiff's attorney.

(2) Because the court erred in overruling motion of counsel for defendant, made after the evidence for the plaintiff was all in, to strike from plaintiff's petition all items of account shown on statement attached bearing date on and prior to March 23, 1916, for the reason that the evidence failed to show any mutuality of accounts, as alleged in the petition, between the parties, and it appearing that such items, the subject of said motion, were barred by the statute of limitations.

(3) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "An account which is more than four years old is barred, and cannot be recovered on unless you find that there was a mutual account between the parties. Now a mutual account is where there is an indebtedness on both sides—it must be mutual. The court charges you that a mere payment on an account where, if a man owes you, say, $100 and pays you $50—that does not make a mutual account, and does not keep that particular account in date. Partial payments do not add anything to the life of an account, but to extend an account, the life of an account, there must be a mutual account—where one party owes another and where credit is expended upon the faith of such account. A mutual credit is expended upon the faith of such account. A mutual account must be between the parties themselves and not between others. Where there is a mutual account, the statute does not begin to run except from the date of the last item of such mutual account." Said charge of the court is error, for the reason that the evidence fails to make any issue upon the question of mutual accounts; it appearing therefrom without conflict that there was only one account, to wit, the account of Wildes against Joiner, and that payments were made thereon from time to time by Joiner in money and in merchandise.

(4) Because during the progress of the trial, after it had been conclusively shown that the defendant had not boarded at Wildes' house after the 28th day of May, 1917, the statement of account attached to the petition, showing that the defendant was indebted for board up to June 1, 1918—one year after the evidence disclosed he had left the house of plaintiff, counsel for plaintiff's counsel, without offering any amendment and without the knowledge or consent of the court, made in pencil on the itemized statement of account attached to the original petition the following material changes, to wit: The year 1915, being the date when the account began according to said statement of account, was changed to 1914, and the years 1916, 1917, and 1918 were, respectively, changed to the years 1915, 1916, and 1917, said petition, so altered and changed, having gone out with the jury after the charge of the court. Counsel for defendant saw counsel for plaintiff making said change but did not know that it was the original petition upon which said alterations were being made.—Statement by Editor.

Patterson, Copeland & Slater, of Valdosta, for plaintiff in error.

W. L. Cranford and Walker, Small & Little, all of Valdosta, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. [1-4] This case arose by reason of a suit upon an open account. Upon conflicting evidence the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, the verdict has the approval of the trial judge, and, there being no merit in the special grounds of the motion for a new trial, it was not error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

GOLDING v. PARRISH et al. (No. 11769.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Private roads §8—Removal of obstructions is matter for ordinary.

The removal of obstructions from a private way is a matter for the decision of the ordinary.

2. Certiorari §36—Not dismissed because exceptions to decision not tendered at the time.

A certiorari to a decision will not be dismissed because exceptions to the decision were not tendered at the time in writing.

3. Private roads §8—Matters to be shown before obstructions removed stated.

An applicant for the removal of obstructions from a private way must show, not only uninterrupted use for more than seven years, but that the way is not more than 15 feet wide, that he has kept it open and in repair, and that it is the same 15 feet originally appropriated.

4. Certiorari §70(8)—Judgment refusing to sanction certiorari not disturbed when supported by evidence.

Where, in a proceeding before the ordinary, there was some evidence to sustain each necessary ingredient of the case, a judgment of the superior court refusing to sanction a certiorari will not be disturbed as not supported by the evidence.

5. Evidence §502—Qualification of opinion testimony on cross-examination construed.

In a proceeding to remove obstructions from a private road where one of the petitioners testified positively on direct examination that the roadway was not over 15 feet wide, his statement on cross-examination, that he would not swear to such fact positively as he had never measured it, could be understood as qualifying his previous testimony only to the extent of disclaiming his ability to swear with mathematical exactness to a distance which had not been measured.

6. Evidence §589—Party's testimony to be construed in accordance with manifest intent.

While the evidence of a party testifying in his own behalf should generally be construed most strongly against him, it should still be construed in accordance with the manifest intent and purpose of the witness as disclosed by his testimony.

Error from Superior Court, Thomas County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Suit by J. B. Parrish and others against E. V. Golding to reopen a private road and remove obstructions placed therein by defendant. Judgment for petitioners and certiorari refused by the superior court, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

H. J. MacIntyre, of Thomasville, for plaintiff in error.

Louis S. Moore, of Thomasville, for defendants in error.

JENKINS, P. J. [1, 2] 1. "The removal of obstructions from a private way is a matter for the decision of the ordinary, not the court of ordinary, and a certiorari to a decision on such a matter will not be dismissed, because exceptions to the decision were not tendered at the time in writing." Fortson v. Mattox, 67 Ga. 282 (1).

[3] 2. "Before an applicant can have obstructions removed from a private way, he must show not only that there has been an uninterrupted use for more than seven years, but that it is not more than 15 feet wide, that he has kept it open and in repair, and that it is the same 15 feet originally appropriated."

ed." Forrester v. McKaig, 144 Ga. 702, 87 S. E. 1060.

[4] 8. Since the respondent's petition for certiorari attacks the judgment only on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence, and since there is some evidence to sustain each necessary ingredient of the applicant's case, the judgment refusing to sanction the certiorari will not be disturbed. Horton v. State, 123 Ga. 145 (2), 51 S. E. 287; Burley v. City of Atlanta, 14 Ga. App. 815, 82 S. E. 357.

[5, 6] 4. The showing made by the applicants was weakest in so far as it pertained to the proof that the private way in question was not more than 15 feet wide. One of the applicants testified positively on direct examination that the roadway was not over 15 feet wide. On cross-examination he stated that he would not swear to such fact positively, as he had never measured it. While it is the general rule that where a party testifies in his own behalf, his evidence should be construed most strongly against him (Farmer, Adm'x, v. Davenport, 118 Ga. 289, 45 S. E. 244), still, in the proper application of this rule, such evidence should be construed in accordance with what was the manifest intent and purpose of the witness as disclosed by his testimony; and in so viewing it, the witness, even though a party, could be understood to have thus qualified his previous testimony only to the extent of disclaiming his ability to swear with mathematical exactness as to a distance which had not been measured.

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Criminal law §126(2)—Change of venue mandatory when evidence reasonably shows danger of lynching.

Under the express provisions of Acts 1911, p. 74, it is mandatory on the judge to grant a change of venue in a murder case when the evidence submitted reasonably shows that there is probability or danger of lynching or other violence.

2. Criminal law §126(2)—Affidavits held to show danger of lynching requiring change of venue.

Affidavits on a motion for a change of venue in a murder case after reversal of the judgment on the first trial held to show such probability or danger of lynching or other violence as to require a change of venue under Acts 1911, p. 74.

Error from Superior Court, Taliaferro County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Dink Butler and another were convicted of murder, and they bring error. Reversed.

See, also, 103 S. E. 809.

The following affidavits were used on the motion for a change of venue:

Personally comes J. A. Beazley, who deposes and says as follows: He was attorney for defendants in the above-stated case. That immediately following the shooting there was grave danger of lynching and same was narrowly averted by some of the citizens of Crawfordville and the officers. These citizens promised the crowd which surrounded the jail the night of the shooting that, if they would not molest the negroes, they would see that a special term of court was called and the negroes speedily tried and executed. A special term was called, same being called for January 3d. Deponent heard repeated remarks that they were going to get the negroes. At the time of the trial feeling was very high on the part of the friends of the dead man and others bent upon mob violence. Deponent heard repeated threats to lynch the negroes himself. He heard, through reliable sources, of plans and threats to lynch them. He was warned a number of times by friends that an effort would be made to do this deponent violence and there was grave danger at that time of violence being attempted upon the negroes and their counsel. Deponent knows positively that this danger still exists, and while he does not believe the danger to deponent himself is as grave as it was, he does know that the danger to the defendants is greater since the Supreme Court decision. There is now a deliberate determination and plan to get them when they are brought back for trial. At the last August court, when it was thought defendants might again be tried, deponent was warned by a number of persons who claimed to know their plans, and deponent does believe that these informants know the plans. These informants even gave the details of the plans to lynch defendants at the last August court if they should have been brought back for trial. Deponent has kept in close touch with the situation. He is intimately acquainted with the situation to-day. He swears positively that there is not only a grave danger of a lynching if defendants are brought back to Taliaferro county for a trial, but he swears that efforts to lynch the defendants are, in deponent's opinion, an absolute certainty. Deponent himself has heard the threats. He has had reports on the situation from those who were in position to know the facts and who are reliable and he knows that an attempt to lynch is certain and said efforts will be made with such determination as to be almost certain of success. Defendants show that they are now in jail at Augusta, and that the superior court convenes there in November, and a trial could be had at that court. Police protection will be ample and the trial will be removed from the scene of the tragedy. This affidavit made to be used as evidence in the above-stated case. Sworn to and subscribed before me this 25th day of October, 1920.

J. A. Beazley.

Personally comes W. J. Sturdivant, who on oath says he is sheriff of said county; that on the — day of December, 1919, Will Rainey and Dink Butler got into an altercation, and Will Rainey received a mortal wound from which he died in several days. There were a number of shots fired by both Rainey and Butler according to the testimony at the trial. On the night of the homicide, when the negroes were placed in jail at Crawfordville, a crowd gathered around the jail and there was grave danger of mob violence. A number of prominent citizens of the town came out and a lynching was averted. The next day the negroes were carried to Washington, Ga., where they were kept till the trial on January 3, 1920. They were convicted of murder—Butler sentenced to hang; Fewes given life sentence. The case was appealed to the Supreme Court, and the court reversed the lower court, holding that the evidence was not sufficient to convict. The defendants are now in jail at Augusta for safe-keeping, as it is very probable that violence would be done or attempted on them if kept here. Deponent is conversant with the situation in the county now, and believes most strongly that if an attempt is made to bring the defendants back to this county for trial that an attempt to lynch them will be made and might succeed. This has been rendered more certain by decision of the higher court, and parties realizing that a conviction of murder may not stand would be more likely to resort to violence than before. Deponent knows that these threats have been made and believes they will be attempted and possibly carried out.

This affidavit is made to be used in the above-stated application.
W. J. Sturdivant.

Personally comes O. F. Portwood, a practicing physician at Crawfordville, and on oath says that he attended Will Rainey at the time he was shot by Dink Butler, and was conversant with the situation as regarded the danger of lynching at that time.

That a crowd formed in Crawfordville the night of the homicide, and it was with great difficulty that a lynching was averted. Deponent believes that had they not been carried to Washington they most probably would have been killed.

Deponent believes now that it is very probable that, if they are again brought to Crawfordville, an attempt will be made to lynch them.
O. F. Portwood, M. D.

Personally comes W. C. Chapman, one of the county commissioners of said county, and chairman of the board and makes this affidavit to be used as evidence in the above-stated application.

Deponent was called on on the night of December, 1919, just after Will Rainey was shot, to help the sheriff prevent violence being done Dink Butler and Fate Fewes, who had just been lodged in Taliaferro county jail.

Deponent found a large and angry crowd around the jail who seemed determined to lynch the defendants.

Deponent, together with Rev. J. B. O'Quinn, the Baptist minister of Crawfordville, and other citizens, sought to have the crowd desist from such efforts and with difficulty prevented any violence that night. The next day the defendants were carried to Washington jail.

The defendants were tried and found guilty of murder. The case was carried to the Supreme Court, and the lower court reversed.

Threats of violence were made against the defendants and even against their attorney. Deponent fears that since the Supreme Court has rendered it probable that the defendants cannot be hung legally that there will be grave danger of a lynching when defendants are brought back here again for trial.

W. C. Chapman.

Personally appears C. Parham, who on oath deposes and says that he is a resident of Taliaferro county, and that he knows of conditions in said county with reference to the safety of Dink Butler and Fate Fewes, and that he is thoroughly satisfied that if these defendants are brought to said county for trial an attempt will be made to lynch them, and, knowing conditions as they exist, he believes said attempt would be successful.

Deponent last August court was invited to join in a plan and purpose to take the negroes away from the sheriff at Barnett when he brought them up, it being thought then that they would be tried at the August term of court.

Deponent knows that the danger of violence being done the defendants at that time was most grave and indeed certain, and he knows that the same conditions prevail now.

This affidavit made to be used as evidence in application for change of venue.

J. C. Parham.

R. W. Golucke, sworn by the state:

Question by the Solicitor: Mr. Golucke, you are clerk of the superior court Taliaferro county? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you consider it likely that violence will be done the defendants if brought back here for a trial? A. Well, if I were asked to point out a leader who I thought would lead a crowd to do so, I don't think I could do so.

Q. Do you think it likely that violence would be done them? A. Well, not unless the Rainey boys did it. I do not think any one else would do so. The Rainey boys might. Outside of them, I don't hardly think any others could get together enough to lynch the negroes. The people in Mr. Rainey's community want to see them punished, but know of no one who would act as a leader to do violence. I heard a lot about lynching them just after the killing of Mr. Rainey, and at the trial here and at the last August term of the court, when people thought they would be brought back for trial.

[Signed] Ralph W. Golucke.

R. C. Norman, of Washington, Ga., and M. L. Felts, Sol. Gen., of Warrenton, for the State.

LUKE, J. [1] 1. Upon the hearing of a motion to change the venue in a murder case, upon the ground that there is probability or danger of lynching or other violence being done to the petitioner, if the evidence submitted reasonably shows that there is probability or danger of lynching or other violence, then it is mandatory upon the judge to change the venue to some county in the state, where, in his judgment, the petitioner can be safely tried. Acts of 1911, p. 74; Kennedy v. State, 141 Ga. 314, 80 S. E. 1012; Graham v. State, 141 Ga. 812, 82 S. E. 282; Newman v. State, 143 Ga. 270, 84 S. E. 579; Bivins v. State, 145 Ga. 416, 89 S. E. 370; Marshall v. State, 20 Ga. App. 416, 93 S. E. 98.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. March 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Brokers — 82(1)—Description of property held not to render petition subject to general demurrer.

Where a contract giving one an exclusive agency for the sale of real estate was headed "Atlanta, Ga.," the description of the property giving the street and number, the size of the lot, the number of rooms and stories, and a description as to the finish of the house, etc., was not so vague and indefinite as to render the petition in an action for commissions subject to general demurrer, where it alleged that the broker had procured a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy on the terms stated.

2. Brokers — 43(3)—Description of property in agency contract held sufficient to be applied to subject-matter by proper proof.

Where a contract giving one an exclusive agency for the sale of real estate and describing the property by street and number and giving the size of the lot, the number of rooms and stories, etc., was headed "Atlanta, Ga.," the property would be treated prima facie as in Atlanta, and the description could be applied to the subject-matter by proper proof.

3. Contracts — 10(1) — Contract of agency held not unilateral, where purchaser had been procured.

In an action on a contract giving plaintiff an exclusive agency to sell defendant's real estate signed only by defendant, a petition alleging that defendant procured a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy, and who actually offered to buy, held not subject to demurrer on the ground that the contract alleged was unilateral.

4. Brokers — 82(1)—Petition held not demurrable, because not attaching contract with purchaser or alleging binding contract.

In a broker's action for commissions, a petition alleging that plaintiff found a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy, and who actually offered to buy, on defendant's terms, held not subject to demurrer for failure to attach the contract between defendant and the purchaser, or show that there was a binding contract under which the purchaser was bound to accept the property.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by C. A. Forsyth against J. E. Porter. Judgment for plaintiff, and petition for certiorari overruled by the superior court, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The action was for a broker's commission on a sale of real estate. The petition alleged that defendant entered into a contract in writing constituting petitioner his sole agent for 15 days for the purpose of negotiating a sale of said property, that under the terms of the contract defendant was to be paid a specified commission, that on a day specified, and during the agency, petitioner found a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy, and who actually offered to buy, on the terms stipulated by defendant, and that defendant had refused to consummate the sale. A copy of the contract between petitioner and defendant was attached, and described the property as stated in the opinion. It was signed only by defendant. No copy of the contract between defendant and the purchaser was attached. The grounds of demurrer, as stated in the petition for certiorari, were as follows:

That said petition does not set forth the cause of action; that the description of the real estate was insufficient to create a binding contract; that the contract is unilateral; that the written contract to buy should be attached to petition; that no binding contract is set up in said petition, showing that the purchaser is bound to accept the property; that said contract is incomplete, and cannot be connected up with any other written document for the reason that no other writing is referred to in said contract of listing; that the contract purports to be complete and covered by the writing and that parol evidence would not be permissible to add to, to take from, or to connect up said contract with any other writing by which a complete contract could be set forth by which the purchaser would be bound to accept the property as alleged in plaintiff's petition.

—Statement by editor.

Randolph & Parker and Lovick G. Fortson, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Holbrook, Corbett & White, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. [1] Where a contract for the sale or exchange of land was headed "Atlanta, Ga., 3/1/1920," and described the property to be sold as "S. Boulevard St., No. 667, size of lot 50x200, No. of rooms, 6, stories 1," with description as to the finish of the house, etc., the description was not so vague and indefinite as to render subject to general demurrer a petition for the recovery of a real estate broker's commission, wherein the broker alleged that he had procured a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy on the terms stated, etc.

[2] Prima facie, the property mentioned in the contract would be treated as in Atlanta, Ga., in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary, and while the description was carelessly made, it could be applied to its subject-matter by proper proof. The above is in principle the ruling in Bush v. Black, 142 Ga. 157, 82 S. E. 530. See also Pearson v. Horne, 139 Ga. 453, 77 S. E. 387; Tolbert v. Short, 150 Ga. 413, 104 S. E. 245.

[3, 4] The petition was not subject to any ground of demurrer urged by the defendant. This case differs from the ruling in Glover v. Newsome, 132 Ga. 797, 65 S. E. 64. For no reason assigned was it error for the judge of the superior court to overrule the petition for certiorari.

Carriers ~~§~~408(4)—Liability for injury to sample scales in trunk shown by evidence.

In action in justice court for damage to sample scales bolted in steel banded trunk, evidence held sufficient to authorize a recovery on theory of rough handling.

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; M. C. Tarver, Judge.

Action in justice court by A. L. Edwards against W. D. Hines, Director General. Judgment for plaintiff, certiorari denied by superior court, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Answer of justice to writ of certiorari:

Now comes T. C. McBryde, justice of the peace, in answer to the writ of certiorari in the above-stated case, and says that the facts set out in the certiorari are true, with the exceptions to paragraphs 3 and 4. A. L. Edwards, testified: That on the 9th day of November, 1919, I purchased a first-class ticket from Dalton, Ga., to Gainesville, Ga., over the Southern Railway, and delivered to the baggage master at Dalton, Ga., for shipment, three pair of automatic scales to be checked. I told the baggage master what the trunks contained, and described the nature of the scales to him. In addition to this, each trunk had a printed sign on it, fully exposed to view, marked, "Glass, Handle with Care." The trunks in which the scales were contained were very strongly built, and the scales were securely bolted to the trunks. They were so well packed that with any ordinary handling it would have been impossible to have broken them. In these trunks the scales can be slid down an ordinary stairway without breaking them, and unless they were handled very roughly they would not break. Judging from the injury they received, it is my opinion that they were thrown out of cars and roughly and negligently handled. When the scales were checked to Gainesville, the agent required excess charges, and I paid the excess charges which he demanded. I was not asked by the agent to place a valuation on the scales, and for that reason I did not do so. These scales were packed in the trunks by myself, and I know that they were in good condition when delivered to the Southern Railway Company. When I got to Gainesville, Ga., and received the three trunks containing the scales from the agent at Gainesville, Ga., and opened the trunks in the presence of the baggage agent at Gainesville, I found that two pair of the scales were badly damaged. That I called the attention of the baggage agent to the damaged condition of the scales, and asked the agent what to do about it. The agent told me to have the scales repaired, and that the railroad company would pay me the cost of the repairs. That I had the scales repaired, and the actual cost was $65, which amount was paid by me, the plaintiff, and that I filed a claim with the railway authorities for this amount and that payment was refused and suit brought.

Plaintiff introduced a pamphlet showing a picture of the scales, and illustrating how they were bolted to the trunks, how they were built, and what the damage consisted of; illustrating, also, how hard it was to injure the scales by ordinary handling. The trunks had steel bands on the corners as a protection. The plaintiff further testified that he carried the scales as samples, and that it was not customary to sell and deliver the scales he carried, but that he carried for samples only.

On cross-examination he admitted that he had at some times sold his sample scales, but that was not his custom; that the reason he had three pair of scales with him on this particular trip was that he intended to put another salesman on the road at Gainesville, if he could procure another man to work for him, and that he intended to deliver one pair of the scales to that man; that he always carried two pair of scales, which he used for demonstrating purposes.

ZAPF REALTY CO. v. BROWN.
(No. 11888.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Money received \S 1—Action lies where another has received money which plaintiff is entitled to recover.

An action for money had and received lies in all cases where another has received money which the plaintiff, ex æquo et bono, is entitled to recover, and which the defendant is not entitled in good conscience to retain.

2. Pleading \S 248(13)—Vendor and purchaser \S 341(2)—Amendment to petition by vendee to recover earnest money held not to set out new cause of action, or fail to allege sufficient acts of fraud.

Where a buyer alleges that a realty company had in its possession money deposited with it to bind a client of that company to convey certain land to the buyer, upon condition that the title to the land could be made merchantable within a reasonable time, and that if the title could not be made merchantable within such time the money would be returned to the buyer, an amendment alleging that the company induced the buyer to turn over the money to it by fraudulently representing that the title was free from incumbrances, when, as a matter of fact, it had specified incumbrances on it, merely amplified the cause of action set out in the petition, and was not objectionable, either as setting out a new cause of action or as failing to allege sufficient acts of fraud.

3. Vendor and purchaser \S 35—Petition to recover earnest money held to state cause of action.

The petition set out a cause of action, and was not subject to general demurrer.

4. Vendor and purchaser \S 341(2)—Petition to recover earnest money not subject to demurrer in not showing implied contract to return money.

Nor was the petition subject to demurrer upon the ground that the facts alleged did not constitute an implied contract.

5. Vendor and purchaser \S 341(2)—Petition to recover earnest money not demurrable as not showing implied promise to pay.

The petition was not demurrable upon the ground that it showed that no implied promise to pay arose until January 1, 1920.

6. Pleading \S 192(3)—Paragraph alleging admission not subject to demurrer.

A paragraph of the petition which substantially alleges that the defendant admitted a material fact contrary to its interest is not subject to demurrer.

7. Vendor and purchaser \S 341(1)—Suit held not prematurely brought.

It was not error to strike the plea in abatement alleging that the suit was prematurely brought.

8. Vendor and purchaser \S 341(4)—Charge held full and fair.

The judge's charge was full and fair, and was not subject to any of the criticisms of it made in the motion for a new trial.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

9. Vendor and purchaser \S 341(4)—Whether title was merchantable within reasonable time under contract held for jury.

In an action by an intending purchaser of land to recover a deposit which was to be repaid if title could not be made merchantable within a reasonable length of time, whether title made merchantable December 15th was made so within a reasonable time after September 3d, when plaintiff notified defendant of his objections to the title, held for the jury.

Broyles, C. J., dissenting.

Error from City Court of Sandersville;
E. W. Jordan, Judge.

Action by J. A. Brown against the Zapf Realty Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The charge of the court was as follows:

Gentlemen of the jury, J. A. Brown has brought an action against the Zapf Realty Company; he sues for money, having a receipt. The plaintiff alleges in 1919, in August, he deposited with the Zapf Realty Company the sum of $514, to be applied to the purchase price of a certain tract of land, provided the title to the land was merchantable, or provided the owner of the land could make good title, and that if the title was not merchantable or made merchantable within a reasonable time then the money was to be refunded by the Zapf Realty Company to him. The plaintiff in this case contends, under the terms of the contract, he had until the 5th day of September, 1919, to look into the title and ascertain the condition of the title; he alleges he found various incumbrances outstanding over the land; he alleges that the Zapf Realty Company and the owner of the land did not within a reasonable time remove these incumbrances, so as to make the title to the land merchantable; he demands that his money be refunded and the defendant declines to return the money, and he now brings his suit for $514. The plaintiff further alleges that this contract was procured from him by fraud; that the defendant's agent represented to him at the time the contract was signed that there was no lien or incumbrance of any character over the land; he alleges if he had known the land was incumbered he would not have entered into the contract, and after ascertaining it was incumbered he demanded his money and thereby to rescind the contract.

The Zapf Realty Company admits receiving the money, but contends that within a reasonable time, as provided by the contract, that the title to the land the plaintiff agreed to buy was made merchantable and put in good shape, and that by the time the plaintiff was required to make his next payment upon the land the title was then in good condition and in merchantable shape. The defendant alleges that the plaintiff really breached the contract.

Gentlemen of the jury, I charge you in this case that you are to ascertain from your knowledge of human nature and the circumstances of this case what was a reasonable time for the Zapf Realty Company to make the title to this land merchantable. Now, if you believe from the evidence in this case that within a reasonable time after September 5th the Zapf Realty Company, or the owner of this land, put the title in merchantable shape, that that was done within a reasonable time, I charge you in this case that the plaintiff could not recover; that the amount so paid by him, $514, would go to the purchase price of the land; that he could not recover. I charge you, however, that if you believe from the evidence in this case that this title was not put into merchantable shape within a reasonable time after September 5th, and after an examination disclosed the incumbrances or liens over the land, if you find it was not put in merchantable shape within a reasonable time, then in this case the plaintiff would have the right to recover, and the obligation would be upon the defendant, the Zapf Realty Company, to refund the deposit of $514 so received. If you believe these are the conditions and facts of the case, then the plaintiff in this case would have the right to recover and ought to recover. If you believe in this case the seller of this land, or the agent of the Zapf Realty Company, made representations that there were no incumbrances upon this land nor liens outstanding against it, and if you furthermore believe that the plaintiff, Brown, entered in on that representation in purchasing the land, and you believe the representations were untrue, then I charge you the plaintiff in the case would have the right to rescind his contract and recover for $514, that is, if you believe the contract was entered into by fraudulent representations as to the conditions of the title. The defendant contends, of course, that the contract was not founded upon fraud; that no misrepresentations were made as to the nature and character of the title prior to the time the contract was signed.

Now, Gentlemen of the jury, as to the language of the contract, the material parts of it, it is as follows: "I have today deposited with the Zapf Realty Company $514 as part of the main purchase money to bind this trade until January 1, 1920, having until September 5, 1919, as time being allowed for examination of title by my attorney. If said title is merchantable I agree to make settlement as above stated, but if said title is not merchantable, and cannot be made merchantable within a reasonable time, cash payment is to be refunded to me and contract canceled." Time is the essence of this contract. I charge you it was the duty of the plaintiff under this contract to look into and examine this title by September 5, 1919; that was the time under the contract to look into it; and then it was his duty to disclose to the Zapf Realty Company any defects, obligations, or incumbrances to the title, and it was incumbent upon the Zapf Realty Company, or the owners of the land, to cause these incumbrances to be removed within a reasonable time after September 5, 1919.

As I have said to you, you are the judges of what is a reasonable time under the circumstances of this case. You may consider the nature or character of the trade; you may consider all the evidence in this case and all the circumstances and all the conditions in order to ascertain what was a reasonable time. If the defendant did not within a reasonable time remove all incumbrances, then the plaintiff ought to recover in this case. On the other hand, if you believe within a reasonable time, of which you are to be the judges, these incumbrances were removed and this title was made merchantable, then you should find for the defendant.

Under the rules of law I have given you in charge, if you find for the plaintiff, the form of your verdict should be, "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff $514, with interest at 7 per cent.," stating from whatever time he should recover, and the principal and interest should be stated separately.

If you find for the defendant, the Zapf Realty Company, the form of your verdict should be, "We, the jury, find for the defendant."

Evans & Evans and W. M. Goodwin, all of Sandersville, for plaintiff in error.

Roy V. Harris, of Louisville, and J. C. Newsome, of Sandersville, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. The plaintiff's petition substantially alleged that the defendant was in possession of $514 belonging to plaintiff, which the defendant was in equity and good conscience bound to repay him on an implied promise so to do; that on March 1, 1919, the plaintiff, through the defendant, entered into a contract with one Cobb, whereby he agreed to purchase from Cobb described lands; that the plaintiff then and there deposited with the defendant $514 to bind a sale until January 1, 1920; that the said contract provided that the plaintiff should have a certain time to examine the title to the land, and that if the title was not merchantable, and could not be so made within a reasonable time, the said cash payment was to be returned to the plaintiff and the trade rescinded; that at the time of filing the petition the title was not merchantable, because Cobb had no title to the land, and it was incumbered with a security deed, securing a debt of $4,000; that a reasonable time had elapsed for the title to be made merchantable, and that it had not been so made; and that the defendant refused to repay $514 in its possession.

A contract dated August 1, 1919, signed by the plaintiff and accepted in writing by Cobb, a copy of which was attached to the petition, provided that the plaintiff should pay a fixed sum for the land, $514 of which was to be paid in cash, an additional amount on January 1, 1920, and the balance in equal annual installments on January 1 of each year, with the privilege of paying the full balance of the purchase price on the date fixed for the payment of any installment. The contract further stated that the plaintiff had deposited with the defendant, "for good will, $514, as a part of the purchase money to bind this trade until January 1, 1920, until September 5, 1919, time being allowed for the examination of the title by my attorney," "and if said title is merchantable, I agree to make settlement as above stated, but if said title is not merchantable, and cannot be made merchantable within a reasonable length of time, the said cash payment is to be returned to me and the trade canceled. Time is the essence of this contract."

The plaintiff was allowed to amend his petition by alleging that the contract was void and not binding, because his signature to it was procured by fraud, in that the defendant represented to him that there were no incumbrances upon the land, whereas at the time of the contract it was incumbered by a certain security deed given by the then holders of the title to the Life Insurance Company of Virginia, and that, upon discovery of this fact, he offered to rescind his contract and demanded the return of his money. The defendant denied the material allegations of the petition, and also pleaded that it had until January 1, 1920, or a reasonable time thereafter, to make the title merchantable, and that it was ready and able to do so.

[1-3] An action for money had and received lies in all cases where another has received money which the plaintiff, ex æquo et bono, is entitled to recover and which the defendant is not entitled in good conscience to retain. Whitehead v. Peck, 1 Ga. 140 (3); Knight v. Roberts, 17 Ga. App. 527, 87 S. E. 809. Under this broad rule, the petition clearly sets out a cause of action. The amendment setting up that the defendant represented the land to be free from incumbrances alleged a fact tending to show that the plaintiff was entitled to recover money which the defendant should not in good conscience keep. This amendment merely amplified the cause of action as laid, and it was not error to allow it. The contract attached to the petition is not aptly expressed, but, reasonably construed, it in effect states that the money sued for was deposited with the defendant to bind the trade until January 1, 1920; that the plaintiff had from August

1, 1919, the date of the contract, until September 5, 1919, to investigate the title to ascertain if it was merchantable; and that if it could not be so made within a reasonable time the cash payment was to be returned to the plaintiff, time being of the essence of the contract.

While it appears from the evidence that the plaintiff, prior to bringing his suit, did state that he demanded his money back and withdrew from the trade, and while the evidence further shows that plaintiff stated during the month of September that he was ready to make a settlement in full, he further said that he would not do so because "of outstanding obligations." The plaintiff had from August 1, 1919, until September 5, 1919, to examine the title. On September 3, 1919, he notified the defendant of his objections to the title, and on October 7, 1919, he brought his action. The security deed outstanding and dated March 1, 1917, was not canceled of record until December 8, 1919. On December 9, 1919, certain parties conveyed the land by warranty deed to one Parnell, and on December 15 Parnell conveyed the land to Cobb. On or about December 15, 1919, defendant presented to the plaintiff a deed from Cobb with draft attached.

[9] It therefore clearly appears that Cobb was not in a situation to make a merchantable title to the plaintiff prior to December 15, 1919. The jury, by their verdict, sustained the plaintiff's contention that the title was not merchantable, and not so made within a reasonable time, and, under the evidence, this court cannot say that the jury's view of the matter was not correct.

SHIFLETT v. STATE. (No. 12016.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Criminal law §1160—Verdict, supported by evidence and approved by trial judge, not set aside, though evidence weak.

Where one witness for the state testified positively to the commission of the offense, and the verdict of guilty had the approval of the trial judge, it cannot be set aside for alleged insufficiency of the evidence, though the evidence is weak.

2. Criminal law §670—Exclusion of evidence not error, when court not apprised of expected answer.

The exclusion of a question asked a witness on direct examination is not reversible error, where the court was not apprised of what the answer of the witness was expected to be.

3. Witnesses \S 379(2)—Exclusion of evidence of admission by witness for the state held not error.

On a trial for malicious mischief, the exclusion of evidence that a witness for the state told defendant's witness that he did not see defendant commit the act, and only knew what another told him, was not error.

4. Criminal law \S 814(17)—Failure to charge on circumstantial evidence held not error.

Where one witness for the state testified positively to the commission of the offense, the failure to charge the law of circumstantial evidence, as embodied in Pen. Code 1910, \S 1010, held not error.

5. Criminal law \S 938(1)—New trial not granted for cumulative and impeaching evidence, not likely to produce different result.

Where newly discovered evidence was cumulative and impeaching, and would not probably produce a different verdict on another trial, it was not error to deny a new trial.

Error from City Court of Polk County; John L. Tison, Judge.

Emory Shiffett was convicted of malicious mischief, and he brings error. Affirmed.

The third ground of the amended motion for a new trial complained of the exclusion of testimony that Bill Flippins, a witness for the state, told the witness he did not see defendant commit the act charged, but that Mrs. Dunn did, and that he knew nothing except what she told him.

The fourth ground complained of the failure to charge the law of circumstantial evidence as contained in Pen. Code 1910, \S 1010.

Mundy & Watkins, of Cedartown, for plaintiff in error.

J. A. Wright, Sol., and J. K. Davis, both of Cedartown, for the State.

LUKE, J. [1] 1. The defendant in this case was convicted of a misdemeanor. The evidence was conflicting. If the jury had believed the evidence for the defendant, a verdict in his favor would have been demanded. The evidence for the state was weak, but the jury believed the one witness for the state, who testified positively to the commission of the offense. Therefore, the verdict of guilty having the approval of the trial judge, under repeated rulings of the Supreme Court and of this court, this court cannot set it aside because of alleged insufficiency of evidence.

[2] 2. The assignment of error in ground 2 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, upon the court's refusal to admit evidence, falls within the rule that requires the court to be apprised of what the answer of the witness is expected to be, when the witness is upon direct examination.

[3, 4] 3. There is no merit in grounds 3 and 4 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

[5] 4. The newly discovered evidence was both cumulative and impeaching, and would not probably produce a different verdict upon another trial. For no reason assigned was it error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

GAMMON v. STATE. (No. 11988.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Criminal law \S 822(1)—Instructions to be considered in connection with entire charge.

When instructions complained of present no ground for reversal when considered in connection with the entire charge, the judgment will not be reversed.

2. Witnesses \S 343—Impeachment of prosecuting witness in bastardy case limited to period of gestation.

On a trial for bastardy, the court did not err in limiting evidence of immoral and improper conduct between the prosecuting witness and men other than defendant, offered to impeach her testimony, to the period of gestation.

3. Criminal law \S 1064(4)—Ground of motion for new trial not considered, when not showing pertinent question was asked and answer ruled out.

Where a ground of a motion for a new trial merely set out evidence in narrative form, followed by the statement that it was ruled out, without showing that any pertinent question was asked and that the court ruled out the answer, it could not be considered.

4. Criminal law \S 1064(4)—Grounds of motion for new trial complaining of exclusion of evidence without showing materiality not considered.

Grounds of motion for new trial complaining of the exclusion of an affidavit and a copy of a letter, without showing their materiality, or how they affected the case, without examining other parts of the record, were not in proper form for consideration.

5. Criminal law \S 1147—Amount of fine within limits fixed by law within trial court's discretion.

Imposition of penalties within the limits fixed by law rests upon the trial judge's sound discretion, which cannot be controlled by the Court of Appeals; and hence there was no merit in a ground of a motion for new trial complaining of a fine for $900 and costs for bastardy, on the ground that it exceeded the amount of the bond designated by statute.

Error from City Court of Polk County; John L. Tison, Judge.

Richard Gammon, Jr., was convicted of an offense, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Defendants sought to impeach the prosecuting witness by proving improper and immoral conduct on her part with the witness and others. The court ruled that such evidence should be limited to the period of gestation, and that evidence of acts prior to that period would be excluded. This is the ruling complained of in the second ground of the amended motion.

The third ground sets out the evidence, the exclusion of which is complained of, in narrative form, without questions, answers, objections, or rulings, followed by the statement "This evidence the court ruled out."

The sixth ground complained that the court exceeded his authority in fining defendant a sum in excess of the amount of the bond designated by statute, the fine being $900 and costs.—Statement by editor.

Mundy & Watkins and Bunn & Trawick, all of Cedartown, for plaintiff in error.

LUKE, J. [1] 1. The instructions complained of in the first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial were authorized by the evidence, and, when considered in connection with the entire charge of the court, present no reason for a reversal.

[2] 2. The court properly excluded the testimony complained of in the second ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

[3] 3. "In order for the exclusion of oral testimony to be considered as a ground for a new trial, it must appear that a pertinent question was asked [italics ours], and that the court ruled out the answer; and that a statement was made to the court at the time showing what the answer would be; and that such testimony was material, and would have benefited the complaining party." Griffin v. Henderson, 117 Ga. 382(2), 43 S.

E. 712. Under the above ruling, the third ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial cannot be considered.

[4] 4. Grounds 4 and 5 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, as to the exclusion of evidence, are incomplete and not in proper form for consideration by this court. These grounds, except a copy of an affidavit and a copy of a letter attached thereto as exhibits, are as follows:

"Because the court erred in ruling out the affidavit of Charlie Galloway, sworn to before J. C. Knight, J. P., on the 13th day of April, 1920. This affidavit was offered, having been identified by the witness and ruled out by the court. A copy of this affidavit is hereto attached and marked Exhibit A and made a part of this ground of the motion for a new trial." "Because the court erred in ruling out a letter from George Lindsey, under date of April 11, 1920, and identified by the witness and offered in connection with his testimony. That portion of the letter hereto attached, marked Exhibit B, and made a part of this ground of the motion for new trial."

The materiality of the affidavit and letter, and how they affected the case, could not be ascertained without examination of other parts of the record. See Corona v. De Laval Separator Co., 24 Ga. App. 683(1), 102 S. E. 44.

[5] 5. "The imposition of penalties within the limits fixed by law rests within the sound discretion of the trial judge, and this court has no jurisdiction to control such discretion." Griggs v. State, 17 Ga. App. 301(1), 86 S. E. 726, and cases cited. Under this ruling the sixth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is without merit.

6. There was evidence to authorize the verdict, which has the approval of the trial judge, and for no reason assigned was it error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

WOOD v. WOOD. (No. 386.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 20, 1921.)

Divorce  66—Action properly brought in county in which wife separated from husband resided.

Under Revisal 1905, § 1559, as amended by Pub. Laws 1915, c. 229, providing that divorce action shall be brought in the county in which either the plaintiff or the defendant resides, an action by a wife separated from husband was properly commenced in the county in which the wife resided, instead of that in which the husband resided; the common-law rule that the wife's residence was that of the husband having been changed by such statutes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Davidson County; Ray, Judge.

Action by F. N. Wood against K. K. Wood. From order denying motion to remove the trial to the county of defendant's residence, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action for divorce a mensa et thoro because of cruel treatment, which rendered feme plaintiff's condition intolerable and her life burdensome. It is not necessary to set forth in detail the specific allegations of cruelty. The case is here upon a motion to remove the same for trial to the county of Davie, where plaintiff's husband resides and has his domicile.

J. B. McCrary, of Lexington, and A. T. Grant, Jr., and E. L. Gaither, both of Mocksville, for appellant.

Walser & Walser, of Lexington, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The defendant contends that the domicile of the wife is that of her husband, and therefore the action should have been brought in Davie county, and relied mainly upon Smith v. Morehead, 59 N. C. 360, where the husband resided in one county of this state, and the action was brought by the wife in another county. The court dismissed the bill for want of jurisdiction because, according to the common law, the residence of the wife was that of her husband, and therefore the venue had been improperly laid.

Conceding that to be the rule of the common law, it does not apply to this case, as the law has been changed by statute. In Revisal of 1905, § 1559, it is provided, under the title of "Venue," that, "In all proceedings for divorce, the summons shall be returnable to the court of the county in which the applicant resides," and by Public Laws of 1915, c. 229, that section was amended by striking out the final words "the applicant resides" and inserting in place thereof, the words "either the plaintiff or defendant resides," so that it now reads:

"In all proceedings for divorce, the summons shall be returnable to the court of the county in which either the plaintiff or defendant resides."

Either one of these sections, the original one or that which was changed by amendment, is sufficient, in our judgment, to show clearly the intention of the Legislature to change the rule of the common law, as laid down in Smith v. Morehead, supra. If this is not so, why change the statute at all, or why not simply have provided that the action should be brought in the county where the husband resided or had his domicile? The section before amendment required the action to be brought in the county "where the applicant resided." This obviously implied that each of the possible applicants might have a different residence from the other, but this would not be so if the ancient common-law rule still prevailed, because there was but one domicile, which was that of the husband. And the amended section is, if anything, much more significant of an intention to change the law and accord to the wife, if plaintiff in the action, the right to sue in the county of her residence, as distinguished from that of her husband, for the section, as it now reads, provides that the venue in an action for divorce may be laid in the county where the plaintiff or the defendant resides, thereby plainly recognizing that the parties to the suit may have different residences, for the purpose of determining the venue or place of trial. We cannot admit, for a moment, that the Legislature would do so vain and useless a thing as to enact and then change the statute without intending to alter the former rule of law as stated in Smith v. Morehead, supra.

The defendant contends, though, that there are several cases decided since Act 1871-2, c. 193 (Revisal, § 1559), was enacted which have cited Smith v. Morehead, supra, with approval, and the inference is drawn therefrom that it has been affirmed on this point, as will appear in the report of those cases, which are the following: Hicks v. Skinner, 71 N. C. 539, 17 Am. Rep. 16; State v. Ross, 76 N. C. 242, 22 Am. Rep. 678; Moore v. Moore, 130 N. C. 335, 41 S. E. 943; Cook v. Cook, 159 N. C. 46, 74 S. E. 639, 40 L. R. A., (N. S.) 83, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1137. We have carefully examined all of those decisions, and none of them applies to this case. Hicks v. Skinner was an action to determine the equities of the wife in a trust fund held by Mr. B. F. Moore; the plaintiffs, who were her husband's creditors, alleging that all her rights had passed to her husband because of the unity of husband and wife. State v. Ross, supra, was an indictment for fornication and adultery, and involved the validity in this state of a marriage between a white person and a negro, contracted and solemnizad in another where such marriages were lawful and valid. In Moore v. Moore, supra, the plaintiff, who was the wife, had gone to another state for a temporary purpose, and at her husband's request, with the intention of returning to this state, and afterwards she did return to this state, and after being disowned by her husband, she resided here separately from him for more than the required two years. The court sustained her action against a motion to dismiss it. That case would, in principle and legal effect, seem to be against the defendant. The question in Cook v. Cook, supra, was not one of venue, but related to the pendency of another action. It is, however, to be noted that the defendant in that case, who was the husband, did not ask for a change of venue from Wake county, where his wife had sued him for divorce a mensa, to Alamance county, where he had sued his wife for divorce a vinculo, but virtually admitted her right to sue in Wake county, although her husband resided in Alamance county. The only question presented and decided in that case was as to the plea of the pendency in Alamance county of his suit for divorce a vinculo. So while the court did not discuss or decide the question herein presented, it was tacitly conceded that the suit had been brought in the proper county. In none of those cases was any reference made, even remotely, to the change in the law as to venue, which was wrought by Revisal, § 1559, because, we suppose, there was no need to do so, as the question we have here was not raised in any of them. The nearest to it is what was said in the Moore Case, and that impliedly holds that the wife can have a separate domicile for the purpose of venue, for the plaintiff there did live in this state, and away from her husband for two years or more before her suit was commenced.

Some of the courts in other jurisdictions hold that where the wife is compelled by her husband's conduct to separate herself from him and dwell in a home of her own, she may bring her action for divorce in the county of her own actual domicile, but we are not required to decide as to the correctness of this view, and express no opinion upon it.

The result is that there was no error in refusing to remove the case.

BRAENDER TIRE & RUBBER CO. v. R. K. MOTOR CO. (No. 389.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 20, 1921.)

1. Trial \Leftarrow 356(1)—Judgment cannot be rendered without jury's answer on issues submitting counterclaim supported by evidence.

In an action for a breach of contract, where defendant pleaded a counterclaim and introduced evidence to support it, a judgment cannot be rendered for plaintiff for the amount found by the jury to be due on his cause of action, where the jury failed to answer the issues relating to defendant's counterclaim.

2. Trial \Leftarrow 365(1)—Finding for plaintiff on defendant's liability not answering issues on counterclaim is not finding against counterclaim.

The fact that the jury answered the issues submitting plaintiff's cause of action favorably to plaintiff, and made no answer to the issues submitting defendant's counterclaim, cannot be construed as a finding against defendant on the counterclaim, as well as on plaintiff's cause of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Ray, Judge.

Action by the Braender Tire & Rubber Company against the R. K. Motor Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. New trial.

Civil action to recover the sum of $414.50, balance alleged to be due on contract for certain automobile tires sold and delivered the defendant under a written jobber's agreement. Defendant admitted execution of the contract and the nonpayment of a balance of $226.38 for tires duly received, but set up in defense and by way of counterclaim that the plaintiff had breached the contract and had failed and refused to make shipments as specified in the agreement, by reason of which defendant alleged and offered evidence tending to show that it had been damaged in the sum of $1,800.

Upon issues joined, the following verdict was rendered by the jury:

"(1) Is defendant indebted to plaintiff; and, if so, in what amount? Answer: Yes; $414.50.

"(2) Did plaintiff breach its contract with defendant? Answer: —.

"(3) What damages, if any, is defendant entitled to recover of plaintiff? Answer: —."

Defendant, in apt time, lodged a motion to set aside the verdict, because the second and third issues, relating to its counterclaim, had not been answered. This motion was overruled, and his honor rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $414.50.

Brooks, Hines & Kelly, of Greensboro, for appellant.

Justice & Broadhurst and O. C. Cox, all of Greensboro, for appellee.

STACY, J. [1, 2] There was ample evidence tending to support the defendant's counterclaim, and we think the issues raised thereby must be answered before any final judgment can be entered in the cause. We are not at liberty to say that the jury intended to answer the issues against the defendant, because they did not answer them at all; nor do we think the answer to the first issue a necessary denial, by implication, of defendant's counterclaim. It is true the jury evidently accepted plaintiff's contention as to the correct balance due for the tires sold and delivered to the defendant; but upon the question as to whether there was any breach of the contract, as alleged, and a refusal to ship other tires, which resulted in loss to the defendant, the verdict is silent.

In the case of McKenzie v. McKenzie, 153 N. C. 242, 69 S. E. 134, the following expression was used in speaking of a similar point raised on that appeal:

"The material issues of fact raised by the pleadings should be submitted to the jury, and of course answered by them. Davidson v. Gifford, 100 N. C. 18, and the issues with the responses thereto must be sufficient to support the judgment and dispose of the matters in controversy." Falkner v. Pilcher, 137 N. C. 449, 49 S. E. 945.

As suggested in Wilson v. Railroad, 163 N. C. 499, 81 S. E. 634, we think his honor should have sent the jury back, with directions to answer the remaining issues before receiving the verdict.

Had there been no evidence to support the counterclaim, it might have been disregarded, but in the present state of the record the defendant's motion to set aside the partial verdict, as rendered, should have been allowed.

BOONE v. NEWSOM et ux. (No. 396.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 20, 1921.)

Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1002—In trespass involving location of a line, held, that the jury's finding on a disputed fact as to whether a deed covered land in controversy must stand.

In an action for trespass involving the location of a boundary line, wherein plaintiff alleged ownership of a tract, including the locus in quo, and it was not denied that the parties were abutting owners, and defendants contended plaintiff's deed did not cover the land in controversy and that their own possession was rightful and lawful, the jury's finding for defendants on this disputed fact must stand.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Ray, Judge.

Action by P. V. Boone against J. A. Newsom and wife. Verdict and judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. No error.

The action is for trespass involving the true location of the dividing line between the premises of plaintiff and defendants, who were adjoining landowners. The locus in quo is a strip of land about 28 feet wide, to which both parties claimed title and possession.

H. W. Cobb, Jr., and Fentress & Jerome, all of Greensboro, for appellant.

S. B. Adams and R. C. Strudwick, both of Greensboro, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff's exceptions and assignments of error relate only to the charge of the court upon general propositions of law and, after a careful investigation of the record, we find no sufficient reason for disturbing the verdict and judgment.

Plaintiff alleged that he was the owner and in possession of a certain tract of land, including the locus in quo. It was not denied that plaintiff and defendants were abutting property owners, but it was the contention of defendants that plaintiff's deed did not cover the land in controversy, and that their own possession of said premises was rightful and lawful. Upon this disputed question of fact, the jury's verdict was adverse to the plaintiff.

The exceptions must be overruled.

No error.

PARKER v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. et al.
(No. 99.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 16, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1004(3), 1005(4)—Refusal to set aside verdict because against weight of evidence and excessive not reviewable on appeal.

Assignments that court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict because it was against the weight of the evidence, and because the damages were excessive, are matters that are not reviewable on appeal.

2. Railroads \Leftrightarrow 51/2, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Director General and railroad proper parties in personal injury action.

In an action for personal injuries, both the Director General of the railroad and the corporation itself are proper parties, under Act Cong. Feb. 28, 1920, §§ 206 and 210.

3. Railroads \Leftrightarrow 312(11)—Negligence to back train without light or signal.

The running of a freight train backward, in the dark, without a light, signal, or other warning of its approach over a crossing, is negligence.

4. Railroads \Leftrightarrow 350(8)—Negligence in backing cars without light held for jury.

Where sun set at 5:36 p. m., whether it was negligence not to have a light on the advancing end of a backing freight train going over a crossing a few minutes after 6 o'clock, when it was cloudy and drizzling rain, held for the jury.

5. Railroads \Leftrightarrow 312(16), 347(9)—Ordinance requiring lights admissible.

In an action for injuries by a train moving backward, in the dark, without light or signal, at a crossing, there is no error in admitting proof of an ordinance of the city requiring a light at each end of a train at night, as such ordinance does not change the law as to the railroad's duty.

6. Railroads ⚡307(4) — Negligence to back over crossing without flagman.

It is negligence to back a freight train over a much-frequented crossing in the daytime without a flagman.

7. Railroads ⚡330(3)—Automobilist may assume usual alarm will be given.

An automobilist going over a much-frequented crossing, where railroad maintained a watchman, has the right to expect that the railroad will not omit to give the usual alarm before backing a freight train over the crossing.

8. Railroads ⚡346(5) — Burden of proving contributory negligence upon railroad.

In an action for injuries received in a collision at crossing, the burden of proof is upon the defendant on the issue of contributory negligence.

9. Negligence ⚡93(1) — Negligence of automobile driver not imputed to passenger.

Negligence of driver of an automobile struck at railroad crossing cannot be imputed to a passenger having no control over the movements of the automobile.

10. Railroads ⚡334 — Automobile passenger not negligent in jumping at direction of watchman at crossing.

A female passenger in automobile is not guilty of contributory negligence in jumping from the automobile into the path of a backing freight train in the dark, where she acts upon the spur of the moment, in obedience to the directions of the watchman at the crossing.

11. Railroads ⚡350(5)—Negligence of watchman giving warning held for jury.

In an action for injuries received in a collision with a backing freight train, whether the watchman at the crossing gave timely warning held for the jury.

12. Damages ⚡178—Proof that injuries were embarrassing and humiliating proper.

In an action by a woman for personal injuries, consisting of the loss of both feet, proof that the injuries were embarrassing and humiliating was admissible.

13. Railroads ⚡347(8)—Evidence of incompetency of watchman admissible.

In an action for injuries received in a collision at a much-frequented crossing, evidence as to the physical and mental condition of the watchman at the crossing is competent to show negligence in having a watchman incompetent physically in such place.

14. Trial ⚡260(1)—Refusal to give special instruction substantially given not error.

Exceptions to refusal to give a special instruction cannot be sustained, where it was substantially given in the charge.

15. Railroads ⚡327(12) — Care required of guest in automobile.

All that can be required of a guest in an automobile who has no control over it is to look and listen and warn the driver of approaching danger at a crossing.

16. Negligence ⚡93(1)—Automobile driver's failure to stop at crossing not imputed to guest.

Failure of driver of automobile to stop, after warning given by a watchman at a railroad crossing of the approach of a train in time to stop the automobile, cannot be imputed to a guest in the automobile who had no control over it.

Walker and Stacy, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by Jennie S. Parker against the Seaboard Air Line Railway and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. No error.

This action is brought to recover $100,000 damages for personal injuries sustained in a crossing accident at Weldon, N. C., February 10, 1920. Action was originally brought against Seaboard Air Line Railway Company and Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, but at the trial, by consent of counsel, John Barton Payne, Director General of Railroads, as agent, designated by the President under the Transportation Act, was substituted as defendant in lieu of Walker D. Hines.

Plaintiff alleges negligence, in that the defendant's crossing watchman caused the driver of the automobile in which plaintiff was riding as a passenger to be stopped on the railroad track immediately in front of a train moving backward, in the dark, without a light, and without giving any signal, at a greatly frequented crossing in the town of Weldon, and in that the defendant failed to keep a proper lookout at the crossing and failed to have a light at the rear of the train, as required by ordinance of the town of Weldon. Plaintiff suffered the loss of both legs, one above and one below the knee, as the result of the accident.

Defendants based their defense upon three theories of the case: First, that there was no negligence on the part of the defendants; second, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; and, third, that the negligence of plaintiff's sister, who was driving the car, was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury.

The jury returned a verdict for $45,000, and defendants appealed.

Geo. C. Green, of Weldon, R. O. Dunn, of Enfield, and Murray Allen, of Raleigh, for appellants.

Travis & Travis, of Savannah, Ga., Ashby Dunn, of Scotland Neck, and Daniel & Daniel, for appellee.

CLARK, O. J. The plaintiff was riding as a passenger in an automobile, and on February 10, 1920, at a greatly frequented crossing, a little after 6 p. m., the automobile was struck by the rear car of a backing train. It was a drizzly, rainy evening and in the automobile besides the driver, Mrs. Scott, there were the plaintiff, seated on the front seat to the right of the driver, four young ladies, and Mrs. Scott's son, when it reached the crossing in front of the Terminal Hotel, in Weldon. At that point, where the defendant's railroad crosses the street there are four tracks which converge until the street which is the First street in the town (and on which the party was traveling) intersects Walnut street. Beyond the crossing the railroad and First street, extended, are almost parallel with each other, going west, the direction in which the automobile was moving. Before the intersection of said First street and the railroad the angle is very acute, and the railroad was to the right of the street, getting nearer and nearer until the crossing is reached.

tiff sat, there were no curtains; she being on the right and the driver, Mrs. Scott, to the left. The evidence is that the car was being driven along the street slowly and came almost to a standstill, and the evidence is that both Mrs. Scott and Mrs. Parker looked across the tracks and up and down the tracks, and both testified that they were clear. As they drove along First street, going west towards the crossing, which is just in front of the hotel, the plaintiff testified she saw some freight cars standing still at the right some 400 feet, near the Union Station. Just prior to the approach of the automobile to the crossing, a freight train of 19 cars had come from the direction of Roanoke Rapids to Weldon, and had pulled up across this crossing and then had gone on in the direction of the Union Station and had passed the switch between the crossing and the Union Station preparatory to backing into another track, and these cars were standing still, according to the plaintiff's testimony, near the Union Station. As the automobile slowly approached the crossing these cars commenced backing towards the crossing slowly, without a light or any one upon the advancing train to give warning.

The evidence is that the conductor had gone into the yard office to report the train and sent out one of his brakemen, who reached the train too late. The engineer was at the other end of the 19 cars down towards the river beyond Union Station, and knew nothing of the collision until he had put his train away. One of the brakemen, who was on the other side of the train at the switch, could not see the automobile, and the other brakeman was about halfway the train and knew nothing about what was happening. According to the evidence, this was the situation as the automobile approached the crossing, which, it is testified, was clear. The defendant had provided a flagman or crossing master at that point. He had formerly worked in the express office, but on account of his age and infirmities the company had retired him, and the defendant had then employed and stationed him at this point. The evidence was that he was old and infirm, and that at this crossing more vehicles passed in a day than at any other crossing in the county.

The evidence is that just as the automobile started across the track this agent appeared and cried, "Stop! stop! stop! jump! jump! jump!" Mrs. Parker, who was on the right and nearest the car on the backing train, started to open the door and attempted to get out. One foot was on the ground and one on the running board, when the forward car, moving slowly and noiselessly, struck her on the shoulder, knocked her down, ran over and crushed one of her legs just above the knee; and then the train, for some unexplained reason, moving back, cut off the other leg between the ankle and the knee; her shoulder was also broken. The automobile was struck just in rear of the front wheel and pushed around. The front door was battered and the front fender bent. One of the young ladies was thrown over the head of another who was trying to leave the car.

The rear of the car had the curtains in place, but on the front seat, where the plain-

The plaintiff was 44 years of age, and her normal weight before injury was 223 pounds. There was testimony as to her injuries and sufferings by physicians and others.

There is evidence that the sun set February 10, 1920, at 5:36 p. m. This was not a scheduled train, and the crossing master who gave the order to jump was not examined as a witness.

[1] Both defendants assign as errors that the court refused to set the verdict aside because it was against the weight of the evidence and because the damages were excessive, but these are matters that are not reviewable on appeal. Edwards v. Phifer, 120 N. C. 405, 27 S. E. 79, and citations in Anno. Ed.; Trust Co. v. Ellen, 163 N. C. 47, 79 S. E. 263; Boney v. Railroad, 145 N. C. 255, 58 S. E. 1082, in Anno. Ed.; Cook v. Hospital, 168 N. C. 256, 84 S. E. 352, L. R. A. 1915D, 611, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 158.

The defendant railroad company and the Director General, John Barton Payne, filed separate answers, and the railroad company seeks to avoid liability on the ground that it was being operated by the government.

The act of Congress to provide for the termination of the federal control of railroads, approved February 28, 1920 (section 206a [41 Stat. 461]), provides that actions at law "of such character as prior to federal control could have been brought against such carrier may, after the termination of federal control, be brought against an agent designated by the President," and "such actions * * * may * * * be brought in any court which but for federal control would have jurisdiction of the cause of action had it arisen against such carrier." Another subsection provides that final judgment shall be promptly paid out of the revolving fund created by section 210 of said act.

[2] This exception need not be again discussed, as it has been fully considered, and we have repeatedly decided that both the Director General and the corporation itself are proper parties in such actions as this. Clements v. Railroad and Hines, Director General, 179 N. C. 225, 102 S. E. 399; Hill v. Director General, 178 N. C. 609, 101 S. E. 376, citing numerous cases. The above have been reviewed and reaffirmed since in Gilliam v. Railroad, 179 N. C. 508, 103 S. E. 10; Vann v. Railroad, 180 N. C. 659, 104 S. E. 170; McGovern v. Railroad, 180 N. C. 219, 104 S. E. 534.

[3] The plaintiff rests her case largely upon the ground that it was dark, and the ordinances of Weldon required that there should be a "light at the rear end of the train and front end of the train at night," and, even if it was not night or not dark, the defendant failed to give timely warning, and there was evidence that there was no light at the end of train and no notice given of the approach of the train, except the warning to jump given by the defendant's crossing master, which contributed, it would seem, if it did not cause, the injury to the plaintiff. In any event, the running of the train backward without a light, signal, or other warning of its approach was negligence. Shepherd v. Railroad, 163 N. C. 518, 79 S. E. 968, quoting numerous cases, among them Purnell v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 832, 29 S. E. 953, in which the plaintiff's intestate was killed by a backing train in the same town of Weldon and at a short distance from the scene of this occurrence; the train backing into the depot without displaying a light from the front end of the leading car and without a flagman to give warning. The precedents are too numerous, as quoted in Shepherd's Case, to be again reviewed.

[4] The evidence in the present case was that the sun set at 5:36 p. m., and that the injury to the plaintiff occurred a few minutes after 6 o'clock; that there was no light on the advancing train; that it was a cloudy evening and drizzling rain; and that it was a most frequented crossing. It was for the jury to say whether or not it was negligence for the defendants not to have had a light on the advancing end of the train, which was running backwards (Powers v. Railroad, 166 N. C. 602, 82 S. E. 972; McNeill v. Railroad, 167 N. C. 396, 83 S. E. 704; Dunn v. Railroad, 174 N. C. 258, 93 S. E. 784), and also whether there was a light or not.

[5-7] There was no error in admitting proof of the ordinance of the town. The ordinance did not change the law already laid down in Purnell v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 832, 29 S. E. 953. It was negligence to back the train over the crossing without a light, if it was dark, or without a flagman, if it was not. Lloyd v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1010, 24 S. E. 805, 54 Am. St. Rep. 764; Mesic v. Railroad, 120 N. C. 490, 26 S. E. 633; Allen v. Railroad, 149 N. C. 260, 62 S. E. 1079. The authorities are thus summed up in Russell v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1109, 24 S. E. 512:

"A person who drives up to a crossing in a town or city, where it is the custom to close the gates so as to prevent the passage of vehicles when trains are approaching and open them when there is no danger, is not negligent if he drives * * * upon the track because the watchman is not on duty."

The plaintiff had the right to expect the company would not omit to give the usual alarm, and is not culpable for acting upon that supposition. The watchman should have known if this train was going to back. The train had passed there a few minutes before.

The occupants of the automobile had a right to rely upon the protection that should have been given at this public crossing by a light on the front end of the backing car, or by a flagman or by a watchman, especially as there were no gates. It would seem from the evidence that when the watchman discovered that the train was backing he did run out and give a warning by shouting to "Stop! stop!" but this must have been too late, as he added, according to the evidence, "Jump! jump! jump!" and in obedience to that direction the plaintiff did jump and was injured. It was for the jury to say where the flagman was and what he did and whether he gave sufficient and timely warning. As the injunction to stop and the order to jump were given simultaneously, it must have been too late and the train must have already reached the crossing, as the plaintiff was injured in obeying the instructions to jump. Evidently the flagman did not appear until the automobile was either on the track or near enough to it to be struck by the backing train. There was evidence that the watchman had been sick for a long time before he was given this appointment, and on account of his infirmities had been retired by his former employer, the express company. He was old and slow in his movements. There was ample evidence to submit to the jury the question as to negligence of the defendants, and it was fairly submitted to the jury, who have found it in the affirmative.

[8, 9] As to the contributory negligence, the burden of which was upon the defendants, the plaintiff was not driving the automobile, but was only a guest or passenger in the car. There is no evidence that she had any control over the movements of the car, and the negligence of the driver, if there was any, cannot be imputed to the passenger. Duval v. Railroad, 134 N. C. 333, 46 S. E. 750, 65 L. R. A. 722, 101 Am. St. Rep. 830; Baker v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 43, 56 S. E. 553, and citations in Anno. Ed.; Hunt v. Railroad, 170 N. C. 444, 87 S. E. 210, which distinguishes Bagwell v. Railroad, 167 N. C. 611, 83 S. E. 814, which was relied upon by the defendants; Thompson on Negligence, § 502; 20 R. C. L. Negligence, § 137; Hermann v. R. I., L. R. A. 1915A, 766, note (36 R. I. 447, 90 Atl. 813).

[10] In sudden peril or emergencies, while the plaintiff was "bound to take active measures to preserve herself from impending harm, she was by no means held to the same judgment and activity under all circumstances. The opportunity to think and act must be taken into consideration. And although she may not have taken the safest course or acted with the best judgment or greatest prudence, she can recover for injuries sustained upon showing that she was required to act suddenly or in an emergency, without opportunity for deliberation. It has been said that when a choice of evils only is all that is left to a man he is not to be blamed if he chooses one, nor if he chooses the greater, if he is in circumstances of difficulty or danger at the time and compelled to decide hurriedly." Dyer v. Railroad, 71 N. Y. 228; Hainlin v. Budge, 56 Fla. 342, 47 South. 825; Railroad v. Touhey, 67 Ark. 209, 54 S. W. 577, 77 Am. St. Rep. 109; Gannon v. Railroad, 173 Mass. 40, 52 N. E. 1075, 43 L. R. A. 833; Elec. Co. v. Hudgins, 100 Va. 419, 41 S. E. 736. The subject is elaborately considered by Hoke, J., in Norris v. Railroad, 152 N. C. 513-515, 67 S. E. 1017, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1069, citing numerous cases; and especially is this so in this case, where the injunction to jump came from a watchman of the defendant. It could not be negligence for her, upon the spur of the moment, to act upon such direction from the servant of the defendant, even if it might have been wiser, if she had had full time for reflection, to have done otherwise.

[11] There was no error in admitting the town ordinance, and we think it has been properly proven (C. S. 2825), and the instructions of the court in respect thereto were correct. There was sufficient evidence to go to the jury of the negligence of the defendant, and the question whether a timely warning was given was properly submitted to the jury, which found that this was not done.

[12] Nor can we see any foundation for the defendants' objection to admission of proof that the injuries of the plaintiff were embarrassing and humiliating. The authorities are ample that this testimony was properly admitted. Britt v. Railroad, 148 N. C. 37, 61 S. E. 601; Carmichael v. Telephone Co., 157 N. C. 21, 72 S. E. 619, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 65, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1117.

[13, 14] Evidence as to the physical and mental condition of the watchman was competent as tending to show negligence in having a watchman incompetent physically in that place. The exceptions to the refusal to give special instruction No. 5 cannot be sustained, as it was substantially given in the charge.

The criticism of the charge that it is in conflict with Kimbrough v. Hines loses sight of the important fact that the plaintiff in this action was not the driver of the car. It was held in the Kimrough Case that, while the law does not impose on the driver of the car the absolute duty to stop, his failure to do so may be considered by the jury on the question of the exercise of ordinary care, and that it was error to omit this element in the charge; but this principle can have no application to the plaintiff, who was a guest in the car, to whom the negligence of the driver, if any, will not be imputed, and who had no control over the car and could not stop it.

[15] All that could be required of the plaintiff was to look and listen and to warn the driver of approaching danger, and this duty was imposed on her in the charge.

The prayers for instructions are also objectionable on the same ground, in that they, in effect, required the judge to charge that the plaintiff could not recover if the driver of the car was negligent.

The court charged on the above phases of the case as follows:

"If you should find from the evidence that the plaintiff in approaching the crossing could have seen, by looking, this moving train, and could have known the train was moving towards the crossing, by listening, and that she could have seen it in time to have requested the driver of the car to stop, and you find that if she had requested the driver of the car to stop she would have stopped in time to avoid the injury, that would be the proximate cause of the injury and not the negligence of the defendant, and you should answer the first and second issues 'No.'"

"If you find from the evidence that the watchman was there with his board and gave timely warning—the defendants contend that he told them to stop and waved his board when they were 20 feet away, and contend that there was plenty of time in which the car could have been stopped before reaching the crossing."

"Or if you shall find that Weaver, one of the brakemen, was there at the crossing, and before the automobile got within 20 feet of the crossing he warned them of danger and told them to stop, and they disregarded such warning and drove on, the defendant company would not be liable, and you would answer the first issue 'No.'"

"If you find from the evidence and by the greater weight thereof, the burden being on the defendant to so satisfy you, that the plaintiff, by looking and listening, could have seen this moving train in time to have prevented the injury, and that her sister, Mrs. Scott, would have stopped the car if she had been requested to do so, and find that that was the cause of the injury, she would be guilty of contributory negligence and you would answer the third issue 'Yes.'"

"If Mrs. Scott was guilty of contributory negligence in driving the car, her negligence would not be imputed to the plaintiff. The plaintiff is not responsible for the negligence of Mrs. Scott, unless you find that the plaintiff was negligent in not looking and listening and not requesting Mrs. Scott to stop, and further find that Mrs. Scott would have stopped if the plaintiff had so requested."

"If you find that Mrs. Scott was negligent in driving the car, and you find that that was the sole cause, the sole proximate cause, of the injury, why then you would answer the first and second issues 'No.'"

[16] As to exceptions 17, 18, and 19, it is sufficient to say that if there was warning given in time to stop the automobile, which the plaintiff's evidence contradicts, this cannot be imputed to the plaintiff. In the recent case of Hunt v. Railroad, 170 N. C. 444, 87 S. E. 211, it is said by Hoke, J.:

"There was evidence tending to show that the driver of the automobile looked and listened before entering on the crossing, and it is held with us that it is not always, and as a matter of law, required that a vehicle should come to a stop before endeavoring to cross. Shepard v. Railroad, 166 N. C. 539, and Elkin v. Railroad, 76 W. Va. 733. Furthermore, it is held by the great weight of authority that negligence on the part of the driver of an automobile will not, as a rule, be imputed to another occupant or passenger unless such other occupant is the owner or has some kind of control over the driver. This is undoubtedly the view prevailing in this state. See a learned opinion on the subject by Associate Justice Douglas in Duval v. Railroad, 134 N. C. 331, citing Crampton v. Ivie, 126 N. C. 894, both of these decisions being approved in the more recent case of Baker v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 37-44. And see, also, a valuable article on the subject in 2 Ruling Case Law, §§ 42 and 43, in which the position is also stated with approval, and Non v. Railroad, 232 Ill. 378. There is nothing in the case of Bagwell v. Railroad, 167 N. C. 611, that in any way militates against this position. On the contrary, the principle announced in Crampton v. Ivie is there expressly approved, and the verdict and judgment in favor of the railroad was sustained on the ground that, under the charge of the court, the jury had necessarily negatived any negligence on the part of the defendant."

An examination of the whole charge shows that it presented every phase of the controversy to the jury, and in some respects was perhaps more favorable to the defendant than it was entitled to have.

On careful consideration of all the exceptions, we find no error.

WALKER, J. (dissenting). There was testimony tending to show that the automobile in which were Mrs. Scott and Mrs. Parker (the plaintiff) was being driven very slowly as it approached this dangerous crossing, which was a well-known one to the driver, as she had passed over it before. Mrs. Scott herself testified:

"As I came on towards the crossing, where we were to cross, I slowed down my car almost to a standstill."

And again she stated:

"I went towards this crossing; I was going slowly, because I had just crossed some tracks. Possibly I was going along there about two or three miles an hour. When I first saw these cars I was going very slowly. I had come by express office very slowly. I always go slowly along there, for I realize the danger of the point, and always slow down."

The defendants' testimony tended to show that the signal to stop was given when the car was as much as 25 feet from the track on which the backing train moved, and it varied from that down to 10 feet. Ed. Weaver testified that Mr. Poe, who was stationed at the crossing, was waving his "stop signal," and witness hollered to them, "Look out, ladies, stop;" and at that moment the car had reached a point 10 feet from the pass track, on which was the train. Mr. J. S. Holliday testified that, when they were told to stop, the car was about 25 feet from the track. The testimony tends to show that several, Ed. Weaver, Mr. Poe, and J. S. Holliday, and perhaps others, signaled them to stop at short intervals from the time the car was as much as 25 feet distant to the time it was 10 feet from the track, and even afterwards, as Mr. Poe did so until the near approach of the train compelled him to leave the track and he barely escaped to a place of safety. Ed. Weaver and Mr. Poe were close by the car when they signaled, and Mr. Holliday was about 40 yards away, but everything, as he said, was in plain view.

There can be no question, if the defendants' testimony is credible, that ample warning was given to stop the car because of imminent danger ahead, as Poe had the danger signal in his hand and was waving it, and all of them at the place were frantically warning them, with loud voices, to stop then and there. The strong evidence that they did hear the signal was that of Mr. Holliday, who stated that he was coming from the toolhouse, and when he was about 40 yards distant from the crossing he first heard the signal given by Mr. Poe and Ed. Weaver.

Some of the witnesses testified that they heard the watchman and brakeman "yelling" for them to stop, and L. J. Holloman that he heard some one yelling "Stop" when he was about 125 yards from there. Several witnesses testified that it was daylight when the accident occurred.

There is other evidence for the defendant upon the question of timely warning to stop the car and not cross the tracks, but it is not the strength or weight of the evidence we are so much concerned with as the fact that there was evidence that sufficient warning was given.

In view of this testimony, the defendant requested that certain instructions be given to the jury which were refused, and exception taken thereto, and also to an instruction by the court, as follows:

"If you find from the evidence and by the greater weight thereof, the burden being on the defendant to so satisfy you, that the plaintiff by looking and listening could have seen this moving train in time to have prevented the injury, and that her sister, Mrs. Scott, would have stopped the car if she had been requested to do so, and find that was the cause of the injury, she would be guilty of contributory negligence, and you would answer the third issue 'Yes;' but unless you do so find you would answer the issue 'No.'"

The instructions rejected were as follows:

"(1) If the jury shall find from the evidence that the driver of the automobile heard the warning of the crossing watchman and stopped the automobile near the track and at a place of safety, and that she then started the automobile and drove upon the track, and that plaintiff, in attempting to get out of the automobile, fell and was run over by the train and injured, the jury will answer the first issue 'No' and the second issue 'No.'

"(2) If the jury shall find from the evidence that the defendant's conductor sent the defendant's switchman, Ed. Weaver, to watch the crossing, and that Ed. Weaver was standing at the crossing as the automobile and the train approached the point of collision, and that he gave the driver of the automobile notice that a train was approaching in time for the driver to have stopped the automobile before driving on the track, the jury will answer the first issue 'No' and the second issue 'No.'"

In view of this testimony, the judge was in error when he charged the jury that the driver of the car, as she approached the crossing, was required only to look and listen, and if she did both and neither saw nor heard the moving train, which was backing on the track, it was not negligence for her to proceed and cross the tracks. The duty to look and listen was the only one the law imposed upon Mrs. Scott, or the plaintiff, as the jury would be led to infer from the instruction, whereas we have held, in Kimbrough v. Hines, 180 N. C. 274, 104 S. E. 684, that a person approaching a crossing is required to do more than merely to look and listen, as he must also exercise the care which a person of ordinary prudence would use in the same circumstances, and that the failure to stop before crossing the tracks might be considered on the question of due care, with such other evidence as bore upon the question. We also held in the Kimbrough Case that, if there was negligence of the plaintiff in the respect indicated, it would not be excused by the failure of the defendant's engineer to ring the bell or blow the whistle as a signal that the train was moving, or about to move, toward the crossing. There was evidence to support this view, for some of the witnesses said that it was daylight and the plaintiff, as well as the driver, could have seen the train if they had looked, or heard it if they had listened, or at least there was evidence from which the jury could have found as much.

But his honor charged the jury that, if Mrs. Scott, the driver, was guilty of negligence, it would not be imputed to the plaintiff, unless the plaintiff was negligent in not looking and listening and not requesting Mrs. Scott to stop the car, and the jury find that Mrs. Scott would have complied with the request. There are two objections to this instruction: (1) It should have been qualified by the further instruction that if Mrs. Scott was negligent, and this was the sole proximate cause of the injury, the plaintiff could not recover, and the jury should answer the first issue "No," as, in that case, the plaintiff would be bound by Mrs. Scott's negligence, though she was a mere guest in the car. Crampton v. Ivie, 126 N. C. 894, 36 S. E. 351; Bagwell v. Railroad, 167 N. C. 611, 83 S. E. 814; 2 R. C. L. 1205. The negligence of Mrs. Scott would not be imputable to plaintiff only if it united with defendants' negligence to cause the injury. If it was itself the proximate cause of the wrong to plaintiff, the doctrine of imputable negligence had no application whatever, and the instruction must have misled the jury. (2) But the judge further stated in this instruction, and two others, that if the plaintiff would have seen, or heard, the moving train from her side of the automobile, if she had looked and listened in time to have prevented the injury and Mrs. Scott would have stopped her car, if plaintiff had requested her to do so, and the jury find that this was the cause of the injury, it would be negligence on her part, and they should answer the first issue "No" and the second issue "Yes." If the plaintiff knew the train was backing towards them, it was her duty to have warned the driver; Mrs. Scott, and requested her to stop the automobile, regardless of whether she would have done so or not. If she could have seen or heard the train moving had she looked and listened, and she failed to look and listen, she was negligent, as the car was approaching a railroad crossing, which is a place of danger always, where trains are continually passing. There was no positive evidence to show that Mrs. Scott would have stopped, but the law of self-preservation raises a strong presumption that she would instinctively have done so. But the learned judge, as it appears, confused the doctrine of imputable negligence with the independent negligence of the plaintiff herself, whereas they are two quite different things in the law. As we have already said, whether Mrs. Scott's negligence was imputable to the plaintiff depended upon whether it was concurrent with that of defendant, and if so it was not so imputable. If Mrs. Scott's negligence was the sole proximate cause, the negligence of the plaintiff, if any, was a negligible quantity, as Mrs. Scott's negligence in that case would alone be sufficient to defeat plaintiff's recovery, that is, if it was the sole proximate cause of the injury, and his honor so instructed the jury, but not in connection with or as a qualification of his previous instruction just commented upon. The jury could not therefore tell which one was correct. Edwards v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 99, 43 S. E. 585.

But, however the case may be so far, the instruction that the jury should answer the first issue "Yes," if the defendant had a watchman at the crossing and he failed to give timely warning of the moving train, and no other warning or signal was given by bell or whistle, or otherwise, until the plaintiff was too near the track for it to avail her, and this was the proximate cause of the injury, was erroneous. This instruction entirely excluded such notice or warning of the approaching train as plaintiff or the driver would have acquired by looking and listening, or by otherwise exercising the care of an ordinarily prudent person before crossing so dangerous a place, as every one described it to be. We must keep in mind that the jury were instructed to answer the first issue "Yes," if the particular warnings enumerated in the instruction were not given.

It also excluded from consideration the notice she would have received from stopping if under the circumstances an ordinarily prudent person would have done so at such a dangerous crossing, as the plaintiffs themselves admit it is, and as this court describes it. But it cannot be successfully questioned that it was error to make the plaintiff's exercise of proper care depend upon what her sister and companion, who was driving the car, would have done. She should have performed her part without regard to her sister's conduct, and then she could well acquit herself of any blame. Her sister's negligence cannot be imputed to her, and would not affect the case adversely to her, unless it was the sole proximate cause of the injury to her. There is no statute of this state abolishing grade crossings or requiring gates to be maintained at them to prevent accidents of this kind. This is a matter of public policy, and is peculiarly within the province of the Legislature to deal with, but even the absence of gates does not excuse the failure to look and listen in proper cases, and there was evidence that it was daylight, and the photograph tends to show that the train could have been seen by the exercise of ordinary care, and the Kimbrough Case, 180 N. C. 274, 104 S. E. 684, requires that the driver of the car should look and listen and stop, if necessary for safety in crossing.

The question as to whether the plaintiff exercised proper care when she jumped from the car was for the jury, even though she was confronted by a sudden peril. She must have acted as a person of ordinary care would have done in similar circumstances.

As to the federal statute: This act of Congress was passed when the railroads were returned to the owners in 1920, and this action was brought since its passage. The act of 1920 requires that all suits be brought against the agent appointed to represent the government, and not otherwise, and that any judgment recovered shall be paid out of the revolving fund. The railroad company is not a necessary or proper party under this act, the government's agent being the only defendant. There was a perfectly good reason for this change. The government thereby assumed sole responsibility for all damages sustained during its administration, and provided a fund to pay them and a speedy method of collection. The cases therefore which are cited in the opinion of the court have no application, as they were based entirely upon prior statutes, and the act of 1920 was not considered by any of them. It would therefore seem that the action should have been brought against the federal agent and not against the company, as the agent is constituted the sole defendant. Lanier v. Pullman Co., 180 N. C. 408, 106 S. E. 21, refers to this method of adjustment, but does not refer specifically to the act of 1920, as the question was not involved in that case.

In our opinion, the action should be dismissed as to the railroad company or, at least, that, as there was material error, there should be a new trial.

STATE v. STOKES. (No. 274.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 13, 1921.)

1. Assault and battery \S 100—Constitutional law \S 250—Assault statute in proviso held not a discrimination denying defendant equal protection of law.

Defendant convicted on his plea of guilty of statutory assault on a female and sentenced to confinement in the common jail for three months, assigned to work on the roads, etc., cannot object to the legality of the punishment imposed on the ground he is denied the equal protection of the law by C. S. \S 4215, providing that in all cases of assault the person shall be punished by fine or imprisonment or both, provided that, where no deadly weapon has been used, etc., the punishment shall not exceed a fine of $50 or imprisonment for 30 days, except that the proviso shall not apply to cases of assault to kill or commit rape, or to cases of assault by any man or boy over 18 on any female.

2. Assault and battery \S 100—Defendant, assailant of female, properly sentenced to jail for three months.

Under C. S. \S 4215, defendant convicted on his plea of guilty of statutory assault on a female could be sentenced in the discretion of the trial court to confinement in the common jail for three months, with assignment to work on the roads, etc.

3. Criminal law \S 1213 — Three months' imprisonment for assault on female not cruel and unusual punishment.

Sentence to confinement in the common jail for three months, with assignment to work on the roads, imposed on defendant under C. S. \S 4215, for statutory assault on a female, was not a cruel and unusual punishment within the constitutional inhibition.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pender County; Cranmer, Judge.

J. G. Stokes was convicted of statutory assault on a female, and he appeals. No error.

Indictment was for an assault and battery on Jessie Brown, etc. On hearing defendant pleaded guilty of statutory assault on a female (Consolidated Statutes, \S 4215). It was admitted by the solicitor that no deadly weapon was used and no serious damage done. There was judgment that the defendant be confined in the common jail for three months, assigned to work on the roads, etc. Defendant excepted and appealed.

Stevens, Beasley & Stevens, for appellant.
James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. The statute more directly applicable (Consolidated Statutes, \S 4215), provides that:

"In all cases of an assault, with or without intent to kill or injure, the person convicted shall be punished by fine or imprisonment or both, at the discretion of the court: Provided, that where no deadly weapon has been used and no serious damage done, the punishment in assaults, assaults and batteries, and affrays shall not exceed a fine of fifty dollars or imprisonment for thirty days; but this proviso shall not apply to cases of assault with intent to kill or with intent to commit rape, or to cases of assault or assault and battery by any man or boy over eighteen years old on any female person."

[1] Defendant objects to the legality of the punishment imposed upon him in this case on the ground chiefly that the statute presents an unwarranted discrimination against him and others in like case, and to the extent of denying to him the equal protection of the law, but we cannot so hold. In many authoritative decisions dealing with the question, both state and federal, the power of classification as to the objects of statutory regulation has been referred very largely to the legislative discretion, and its exercise may not be interfered with by the courts unless the same is clearly arbitrary. State v. Burnett, 179 N. C. 735, 102 S. E. 711; Smith v. Wilkins, 164 N. C. 136, 80 S. E. 168; Efland v. Railroad, 146 N. C. 135, 59 S. E. 355; Tullis v. Railroad, 175 U. S. 348-353, 20 Sup. Ct. 136, 44 L. Ed. 192; Insurance Co. v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 562, 19 Sup. Ct. 281, 43 L. Ed. 552; Magoun v. Savings Bank, 170 U. S. 286, 18 Sup. Ct. 594, 42 L. Ed. 1037.

In Efland's Case the court stated the principle as follows:

The Legislature had the right to extend the statutory provisions in question to "certain classes of pursuits and occupations imposing these requirements equally on all members of a given class; the limitation of this right of classification being that the same must be on some reasonable ground that bears a just and proper relation to the attempted classification and is not a mere arbitrary selection."

And in Tullis v. Railroad, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States, the final arbitrator in these matters, held as the approved position on the subject:

"That the power of the state to distinguish, select, and classify objects of legislation necessarily has a wide range of discretion; that it was sufficient to satisfy the demands of the Constitution if the classification were practical and not palpably arbitrary."

Applying the principle in State v. Burnett, a statute was upheld by which citizens of the state under 14 entirely, and under 16 to a great extent, were withdrawn from the ordinary effect and operation of the criminal laws of the state, to be dealt with by the special regulations established in the statute, a classification based upon difference of age. And in Muller v. Oregon, 208 U. S. 412, 28 Sup. Ct. 324, 52 L. Ed. 551, 13 Ann. Cas. 957, the difference of sex was recognized and approved as a proper basis for classification. Speaking to the question in the opinion, Associate Justice Brewer said in part:

"Though limitations upon personal and contractual rights may be removed by legislation, there is that in her disposition and habits of life which will operate against her full assertion of those rights. She will still be where some legislation to protect her seems necessary to secure a real equality of right. Doubtless there are individual exceptions, and there are many respects in which she has an advantage over him; but, looking at it from the viewpoint of the effort to maintain an independent position in life, she is not upon an equality. Differentiated by these matters from the other sex, she is properly placed in a class by herself, and legislation designed for her protection may be sustained, even when like legislation is not necessary for men and could not be sustained."

That was a decision involving the validity of a statute making special regulations as to her hours of labor, and involving her right and capacity to make a living. And all the more should the distinction be recognized in crimes of violence where the superior physical strength of the man puts her at a disadvantage and wherein the purpose of graver injury is not infrequently present. On reason and authority, therefore, the exception based upon an alleged and unlawful classification made by the statute must be disallowed.

[2] Defendant insists further that the imposition of a severe sentence of this kind can only be upheld under a statute affirmative in terms, and is not justified in the form now presented and by way of an indefinite exception, but this to our minds is not based on a proper concept of the law. On the contrary, the statute by correct interpretation and in effect provides in affirmative terms that in all cases of assault with or without the intent to kill the person convicted shall be punished by fine or imprisonment in the discretion of the court, and within this provision shall be included "assault with intent to kill or with intent to commit rape and cases of assault and battery on a female by a man or boy over 18 years of age"; this last being the offense for which defendant's submission has been entered.

[3] The objection that the sentence should be annulled on the grounds that it constitutes cruel and unusual punishment is without merit. The constitutional inhibition relied upon here may only be invoked in cases of manifest and gross abuse on the part of the presiding judge.

From a careful consideration of the record, while we are justified in saying that there appears to have been no other purpose on the part of defendant than to aid his mother in the discipline of a child committed to her care and control, we are of opinion that there has been no error committed to defendant's prejudice, and that the sentence is not in itself so severe as to justify the court in disturbing it as a matter of law.

No error.

LEMMONS v. SIGMAN, Register of Deeds.
(No. 401.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 20, 1921.)

Marriage — 25(6) — In action for penalty for negligently issuing license to minor, evidence held to require submission to jury.

In an action against the register of deeds under C. S. §§ 2500, 2503, for issuing a marriage license to plaintiff's daughter without reasonable inquiry as to her age, she being under 18 years, conflicting evidence as to the girl's appearance with respect to age, and the facts as to reasonable inquiry not being admitted, held to require submission of such issue under proper instructions to the jury, who alone may pass on its weight and the witness' credibility.

Appeal from Superior Court, Davidson County; Ray, Judge.

Action by C. E. Lemmons against F. E. Sigman, Register of Deeds of Davidson County, and from a judgment of nonsuit the plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Civil action to recover of defendant, register of deeds of Davidson county, the penalty of $200 allowed by sections 2500 and 2503, Consolidated Statutes, for issuing a marriage license to one John W. Galloway and plaintiff's daughter, Alma Lemmons, without the consent of her parents and without reasonable inquiry as to her age, she being at the time under the age of 18.

Upon the question of reasonable inquiry, the only point of difference in the case, there was evidence on behalf of plaintiff tending to show that his daughter lived with him in Winston-Salem at the home of one R. F. Bryant; that she was only 15 years old, having reached this age on her last birthday, March 31, 1920, and that plaintiff, at the time, did not know of, or consent to, his daughter's marriage. R. F. Bryant testified:

"I know Alma Lemmons. She was living with her father, C. E. Lemmons, at my house. She was only a child. I would call her about 15 years old."

The defendant, F. E. Sigman, testified that on April 23, 1920, John Galloway made application to him, as register of deeds of Davidson county, for license to marry Alma E. Lemmons. And further:

"I did not know John Galloway. At the time of the application there were present Ernest Lemmons and Alma Lemmons, and I took the statement from all three of them as to the age of the parties to be married, and they stated that Alma Lemmons was 18 years old. I did not know Ernest Lemmons. I observed the young lady, and she looked like she might be a young girl of 18 or 19 years old from her general appearance and dress. She looked like she weighed 125 pounds, had on a long dress and hat turned down over her face, and her face gave the impression of one 18 or 19 years of age. John Galloway was a man clean-shaven, about 25 years old, and weighed 135 or 140 pounds. Had dark hair and dark skin, and had the appearance of being about 20 or 21 years old. They said they were from Winston. I had Ernest Lemmons, Alma Lemmons, and John Galloway, each of them, to sign statement and swear to it as it appears on the license. Before issuing the license I made inquiry as to the reliability of the parties applying for the license. I went into the sheriff's office, and saw Dr. M. A. Bowers, and told him there was a party from Winston-Salem wanting to secure a marriage license; that the contracting parties were Alma Lemmons and John Galloway, and I asked Dr. Bowers if he knew them. He said he did not know Alma Lemmons, but did know John Galloway. I asked him if he was a fellow of reliability, and he said he was a good reliable fellow, and a carpenter at Winston, and said, 'I know him; I am his physician.' I have known Dr. Bowers 10 years. I knew him at Thomasville where I lived, and where he was a practicing physician. Knew his general character was good. Dr. Bowers has lived in Winston more than a year, and he witnessed the license and the affidavit. And the parties applying were at the time in my office."

Cross-examination:

"I made no effort to call up the parties at Winston, either C. E. Lemmons or Virginia Lemmons. The girl said there was no phone at their home. I relied upon the statement of Dr. Bowers as to the reliability of John Galloway. Dr. Bowers told me John Galloway was a reliable party. I knew Dr. Bowers was a man of high character and a good physician, and whatever he said to me I could rely upon. I did not ask Dr. Bowers how long he had known Galloway, or what chances he had to know his character. All I wanted to know was if he knew him, and if he was a reliable man."

Dr. M. A. Bowers made an affidavit which, by consent, was used as a deposition. He stated, in part, as follows:

"I told him [register of deeds] that I did not know Alma Lemmons, but that I did know John Galloway, and told him that he was a carpenter. I also told him that in my opinion any statement that Galloway would make could be relied upon, as I had no reason to think otherwise from my personal knowledge and information I had of him. Then after the license was written out and sworn to by the contracting parties, I witnessed their signatures and their marriage in the register of deed's office by John Moyer, J. P."

At the conclusion of all the evidence, defendant renewed his motion for judgment as of nonsuit. Motion allowed.

T. W. Kallam, of Winston-Salem, for appellant.

J. R. McCrary and Raper & Raper, all of Lexington, for appellee.

STACY, J. The testimony as to the appearance of the girl, with respect to her age, is conflicting; and, upon the question of reasonable inquiry, the facts are not admitted. Hence, considering the evidence in its most favorable light for the plaintiff, the accepted position on a motion to nonsuit, we think the case should have been submitted to the jury under proper instructions. Snipes v. Wood, 179 N. C. 349, 102 S. E. 619; Julian v. Daniels, 175 N. C. 549, 95 S. E. 907; Gray v. Lentz, 173 N. C. 346, 91 S. E. 1024, L. R. A. 1917E, 863.

As said in Furr v. Johnson, 140 N. C. 157, 52 S. E. 664:

"Where there is a conflict of evidence, whether there has been 'reasonable inquiry' is to be submitted to the jury upon all the evidence under proper instructions, but if the facts are agreed, it is a matter of law"—citing Joyner v. Roberts, 114 N. C. 389, 19 S. E. 645.

The jury alone may pass upon the weight of the evidence or the credibility of the witnesses.

The judgment of nonsuit will be set aside, and the case referred to another jury.

Reversed.

(115 S. C. 524)

STATE v. HARTLEY. (No. 10596.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 1, 1921.)

Intoxicating liquors ⇒13—State statutes not repealed by Eighteenth Amendment to federal Constitution.

The statutes of the state in regard to the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes were not repealed by the Eighteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, whenever the enforcement of such legislation would aid in carrying into effect the provisions of the amendment.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Barnwell County; Hayne F. Rice, Judge.

Bill Hartley was convicted of manufacturing and having possession of liquor unlawfully, and he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

A. H. Ninestein, of Blackville, for appellant.

Solicitor R. L. Gunter, of Aiken, for the State.

GARY, C. J. The defendant was convicted on the charge of manufacturing and having possession of liquor unlawfully.

The question in the case is whether the statutes of this state, in regard to the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, were repealed by the Eighteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution. The titles of the two statutes under which the defendant was found guilty are as follows:

"An act to regulate the shipment and transportation, carrying, storing and having in possession of alcohol, alcoholic liquors and beverages, and to provide penalties for the violation thereof." Laws 1917, p. 69.

"An act to suppress the evils of intemperance, to prohibit the manufacture, sale, use, consumption, having possession and storing of spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, brewed, or alcoholic liquors and beverages; to regulate the purchase, use and possession thereof; to provide the punishment for violation of the law." Laws 1917, p. 169.

These statutes were enacted in 1917.

It is not necessary to set forth their provisions, as the question under consideration is, not whether there are certain provisions therein that render these statutes unconstitutional, on the ground that they are repugnant to the Eighteenth Amendment, but whether they were repealed by the said amendment, which is as follows:

Section 1: "After one year from the ratification of this article, the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes, is hereby prohibited."

Section 2: "The Congress and the several states shall have concurrent power to enforce this article, by appropriate legislation."

This amendment was ratified on the 29th of January, 1919, and the defendant was convicted in May, 1920—more than one year after its ratification.

The second section of the amendment, providing that Congress and the several states shall have concurrent power to enforce it by appropriate legislation, cannot be made effective by the several states, unless they enact statutes making the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes an offense against the laws of the state. The amendment contemplates independent legislation, both on the part of Congress and the several states; and the constitutionality of a state statute must be determined alone, by a resort to the provisions of the amendment.

"We are of opinion that the word 'concurrent' in this connection, means a power continuously existing for efficacious ends, to be exerted in support of the main object of the amendment and making contribution to the same general aim according to the needs of the state, even though Congress also has exerted the power reposed in it by the amendment by enacting enforcing legislation, operative throughout the extent of its territory. Legislation by the states need not be identical with that of Congress. * * * But the states need not denounce every act committed within their boundaries which is included within the inhibition of the Volstead Act, nor provide the same penalties therefor. It is conceivable also that a state may forbid under penalty acts not prohibited by the act of Congress. The concurrent power of the states may differ in means adopted, provided it is directed to the enforcement of the amendment. * * * State statutes, rationally adapted to putting into execution the inexorable mandate against the sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage contained in section 1 of the amendment by different definitions, and regulations and penalties from those contained in the Volstead Act * * * are valid. Existing laws of that character are not suspended or superseded by the act of Congress." Commonwealth v. Nickerson, 236 Mass. 281, 128 N. E. 273.

There is nothing in the amendment indicating an intention to repeal or supersede the legislation of the several states, whenever the enforcement of such legislation would aid in carrying into effect the provisions of the amendment. Let us suppose that when the amendment went into effect there was a statute of this state providing that the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from, this state for beverage purposes, was prohibited, and that any person violating the provisions thereof would be punished as therein provided. The state would unquestionably have the power at this time under the amendment to enact such a statute. Why? Because its enforcement would aid in carrying into effect the provisions of the amendment. The fact that such an act may have been passed before the amendment went into effect would not be a reasonable ground for holding that it was repugnant to the amendment.

As hereinbefore stated, the only question now is whether the amendment repealed such existing legislation of the several states as was not repugnant to it.

Whether the statutes under which the defendant was convicted contained provisions that render them unconstitutional will be determined when that question properly arises.

Appeal dismissed.

WATTS, FRASER, and COTHRAN, JJ.,

COTHRAN, J. I concur in this judgment. The second section of the Eighteenth Amendment evidently was adopted with this idea and purpose in view: It had been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, particularly in cases involving interstate commerce transactions and liabilities connected therewith, that when Congress took over a certain field of operations, its jurisdiction was not only paramount but exclusive. It was accordingly apprehended that the effect of the prohibition amendment and congressional legislation appropriate thereto would have been the same upon prohibition legislation by the state, in the absence of a provision limiting the application of that principle. The purpose of the section therefore was, and in my opinion the effect is, to leave to the several states the legislative power to enact or enforce any law, not in conflict with section 1 of the amendment, intended and calculated to enforce the prohibition declared in this section. This would apply to enactments of this character in force at the time of the adoption of the amendment, as well as to those subsequently adopted by the several states. Jones v. Hicks (Ga.) 104 S. E. 771; State v. Fore (N. C.) 105 S. E. 334; Ex parte Ramsey (D. C.) 265 Fed. 953. If the amendment had not been adopted, Congress could not have acted at all, for the subject-matter was exclusively within the police power of the states; with the amendment unlimited, Congress alone could have acted; with the amendment limited as it is, both Congress and the several states may act in legislating for the purpose of enforcing the prohibition declared.

As the Chief Justice shows, there is no question in this case as to a conflict between the state statutes and the amendment, nor, I may add, between them and congressional legislation. Should there appear in a state statute a conflict between it and the amendment, the statute would, of course, have to give way; should it appear between it and congressional legislation, the interesting question of the grant of "concurrent power" to Congress and the several states, by the amendment, so learnedly and entertainingly discussed by Justice McKenna, dissenting, in State v. Palmer, 253 U. S. 350, 40 Sup. Ct. 486, 588, 64 L. Ed. 946, will arise, the effect of which need not now be anticipated.

HUNT v. HUNT et al. (No. 10602.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 11, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1024(6)—Preponderance of evidence necessary on complaint as to findings of fact by court ordering sale of land for minor.

On appeal from an order of the circuit court approving a proposed sale of land held under a will for an infant, a finding of fact by the court that the sum offered was a fair price for the property will not be disturbed unless complaining party satisfies the court by a preponderance of the evidence that the finding is erroneous.

2. Guardian and ward \S 114—Court could order sale of land held for infant under will.

The court did not err in ordering sale of property held for infant under will by guardian with directions not to deliver the same to the infant until she reached the age of 30 years pending an appeal from a decision of judge of probate as to the validity of the will, the proceeds of the property not to be delivered to the ward until all rights of the respective parties under the will were finally adjusted.

Fraser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Bamberg County; Hayne F. Rice, Judge.

Action by Rheta Baring Hunt, administratrix, etc., against Florence Goodrich Hunt, J. A. Guerin, and another. From an adverse judgment, the last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Francis F. Carroll, of Summerville, for appellant.

Miller, Huger, Wilbur & Miller and Paul M. McMillan, all of Charleston, and E. H. Henderson, of Bamberg, for respondents.

GARY, C. J. The record contains this statement of the facts: N. A. Hunt, late of Summerville, S. C., died intestate on the — day of January, 1918, seized and possessed among other property, of real estate in the town of Bamberg, hereinafter described, and leaving as his sole heir his son, A. Morton Hunt.

A. Morton Hunt administered on his father's estate, and he died at the city of Charleston on the 12th day of October, 1918, leaving as his sole heirs and distributees at law his widow, the plaintiff, Rheta Baring Hunt, and his daughter, Florence Goodrich Hunt, one of the defendants, a minor 18 years of age.

On the 12th of November, 1918, after the death of A. Morton Hunt, plaintiff, Rheta Baring Hunt, was appointed administratrix d. b. n. of the estate of the said N. A. Hunt deceased, by the probate court of Dorchester county, and on the 18th day of October, 1918, was by the probate court of Charleston county appointed guardian of the estate of the defendant Florence Goodrich Hunt.

A. Morton Hunt left a will dated the 29th day of January, 1918, which was admitted to probate in common form in the probate court of Charleston county on the — day of July, 1919, and on the — day of February, 1920, said will was admitted to probate in solemn form in the same probate court, but at the time of the decision of his honor, Judge Rice, an appeal was pending from some of its provisions. At the time of the commencement of this action the plaintiff had filed notice that she required said will to be proved in solemn form, but no proceedings had at that time been instituted to prove same in solemn form.

The above action was commenced by the plaintiff about the 10th day of October, 1919, by service of a summons and complaint, in which complaint plaintiff alleges, inter alia, in addition to the above facts in paragraph 6 of said complaint:

"That plaintiff has received an offer for the purchase of the property, hereinafter more fully described, from the defendant John F. Folk, at and for the sum of $20,000, payable $2,000 in cash and the balance of $18,000 in equal annual installments of $2,000 each, with interest on deferred balance at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, the credit portion of the said purchase price to be represented by the bond of the purchaser, secured by a purchase-money first mortgage of the said premises, said mortgage to contain the usual clauses as to taxes, insurance, attorney's fees and receivership, purchaser to have possession, subject to tenants' rights, on September 1, 1919, paying interest on the purchase money from that date at 7 per cent. per annum until titles can be perfected, and in compliance with the terms of said offer the said defendant, John F. Folk, has paid to the attorneys for the plaintiff the cash portion of said purchase price, to wit, the sum of $2,000."

And further in paragraph 7 said complaint alleges:

"The price offered by the said defendant John F. Folk for the said property is, in the opinion of plaintiff, a fair one and advantageous to all parties interested."

And lastly the plaintiff prays in her complaint:

"That a sale of the said property to the defendant John F. Folk be approved by this court, and that the master be authorized and directed to make and execute a proper conveyance of the said property to the said purchaser upon his complying with the terms of his contract, and that the proceeds of the sale, after deducting all costs and expenses connected therewith and with this action, shall be held by the master at interest until the determination of the testacy of the said A. Morton Hunt."

The property is described as follows: " * * * (A hotel building.)" J. A. Guerin filed his answer, denying that $20,000 was a fair and adequate price for said property, further alleging that under the will of A. Morton Hunt he was appointed and had qualified as executor of the said will, and was by said will appointed guardian of the said Florence G. Hunt, a minor, and was instructed by said will not to deliver to Florence Goodrich Hunt the property devised to her under said will until she should reach 30 years of age, and the plaintiff had no right to make said contract of sale alleged in this complaint, or to bring this action, the property involved being a part of the property devised under said will to Florence G. Hunt.

The defendant Florence G. Hunt, by her guardian ad litem, filed formal answer, alleging that she is a minor, a want of knowledge of the facts alleged in the complaint and submitting her right to the protection of the court. The defendant John F. Folk answered, admitting the truth of the allegations of the complaint, and joining in the prayer of the plaintiff.

On the 28th day of January, 1920, an order was signed by the court of common pleas at Bamberg county to take the testimony and report his conclusions of law and facts, with leave to report any special matter.

The probate judge for Bamberg county, acting as master, held a conference and took the testimony on the 10th of March, 1920, and thereafter found and reported to the court that the sum of $20,000 was a fair price for the property, and advantageous to all parties interested, and recommended that a sale of said property to the defendant John F. Folk for said amount be approved by the court as prayed for by plaintiff in her complaint and on the terms mentioned in the complaint.

J. A. Guerin filed exceptions to this report, but they were overruled by the circuit court, and the report confirmed; whereupon J. A. Guerin appealed to this court upon the following exceptions:

"(1) Because, appellant submits, the overwhelming preponderance of the evidence shows that at the time of the proposed sale of the property involved to John F. Folk for $20,000 the said property was bringing in a net annual income of $2,290 by way of rents, and was worth many more thousand dollars than $20,000, the price offered for same by said John F. Folk, and that the said sum of $20,000 is not an adequate price for said property, and therefore his honor Judge Rice erred, appellant submits, in finding that said sum of $20,000 was an adequate price for said property, and that a sale of same for that price would be to the advantage of all parties interested, and in approving a sale of same for that price.

"(2) Because, inasmuch as in the will of A. Morton Hunt, a copy of which is alleged in the complaint and a copy is in the case, the testator devises the property involved to Florence G. Hunt, with instructions that it must not be delivered to her until she reaches 30 years of age. His honor Judge Rice should have held, appellant submits, that under the facts of the case the court should not approve or order a sale of said property, even though an appeal was pending from the decision of the probate judge as to the validity of certain provisions of the will, but should have allowed it to be kept intact until said Florence G. Hunt should reach 30 years of age."

[1] The first exception cannot be sustained, for the reason that the appellant's attorneys have failed to satisfy this court by the preponderance of evidence that the findings of fact by his honor the circuit judge were erroneous.

[2] The second exception must also be overruled, for the reason that the proceeds arising from the sale of the property are not to be delivered to Florence Goodrich Hunt until all the rights of the respective parties under the will have been finally adjusted.

Affirmed.

WATTS and COTHRAN, JJ., concur.

FRASER, J. (dissenting). It is admitted that no valid contract to sell has been made, no necessity shown, or that the infant's estate cannot make the necessary repairs. It is shown that there is an offer of $24,000, and $20,000 should not be accepted.

MITCHUM v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. CO. (No. 10583.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 11, 1921.)

1. Trial \S 83(1)—Overruling objection to evidence not error when grounds not stated.

It was not error to overrule an objection to testimony where the grounds of objection were not stated.

2. Appeal and error \S 1050(1)—Admission of evidence relating to undisputed matter harmless.

In an action for damages from fire claimed to have been caused by sparks from a railroad engine, evidence that not long before the fire plaintiff saw a locomotive throw out sparks and set fire to the grass was harmless, as it only stated the undisputed fact that grass may be set on fire by sparks from an engine.

3. Railroads \S 484(3)—Origin of fire held for jury.

In an action for damages from fire claimed to have been caused by sparks from a railroad engine, where the testimony, though circumstantial tended to sustain plaintiff's allegations, the issues of fact were properly submitted to the jury.

Cothran, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Berkeley County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Action by Sam Mitchum against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Buist & Buist and Octavus Cohen, all of Charleston, for appellant.

E. J. Dennis, of Moncks Corner, and Wolfe & Berry, of Orangeburg, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, through the wrongful acts of the defendant, whereby a fire was communicated from defendant's locomotive engine to plaintiff's dwelling, adjacent to defendant's right of way, which destroyed the dwelling and its contents.

The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint. The defendant made a motion for a nonsuit at the close of the plaintiff's testimony, which was refused; also a motion for the direction of a verdict at the close of all the testimony, which was likewise refused.

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

[1, 2] The first question we will consider is whether there was error on the part of his honor the presiding judge in overruling the objection to the following testimony of the plaintiff:

"Not long before this fire I saw a locomotive throw out sparks and set fire to the grass on two occasions. One was a freight and the other a passenger train. This must have been about the first of April or the last of March. I was there and put the fire out. At one time the fire was about 25 feet from the house, and the other about 30 feet."

In the first place, the grounds of the objection are not stated; and, in the second place, the appellant has failed to show that the testimony was prejudicial. It only states an undisputed fact, that grass may be set on fire by sparks from a locomotive engine.

[3] The other exceptions assign error in the refusal to grant the nonsuit and to direct a verdict on the ground that the evidence did not warrant a reasonable inference that the fire was communicated by defendant's locomotive.

The testimony was circumstantial, but it tended to sustain the allegations of the complaint. Therefore the issues of fact were properly submitted to the jury.

Affirmed.

WATTS and FRASER, JJ., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting in part). I concur in the disposition of the question of evidence as to the other fires set by the engines of the defendant, upon the ground that the objection was not accompanied by a statement of the grounds thereof. Upon the merits of the question raised I prefer that the court should reaffirm the decision of this court in the case of McGill Bros. v. Railway Co., 87 S. C. 178, 69 S. E. 156.

Upon the main point of the appeal, alleged error in refusing motions for nonsuit and directed verdict, I dissent from the conclusions reached by the majority of the court, and will endeavor to make clear the reasons therefor.

The liability of a railroad company for the results of communicated fires is, under section 3226, vol. 1, Code of Laws 1912, absolute. No question of negligence or due care can arise. If it be established that the fire originated upon the right of way, in consequence of the acts of any authorized agent or employee of the company, or was communicated by its engines, the company is liable in damages for the subsequent injury. The statute is one of exceptional liability. It is only just, therefore, that one who claims the benefit of such a statute must bring himself within its provisions.

There is no contention on the part of the plaintiff that his claim comes under the provisions of the first part of the section, that the fire originated upon the right of way, etc. His claim is under the second part, that the fire was communicated to his house by the locomotive engine of the defendant.

The burden of establishing this fact is upon him. He must sustain it by evidence, direct or circumstantial, not by conjecture. This court, however, is not the tribunal for the decision of that issue of fact. It is a court for the correction of errors of law. Its jurisdiction and consideration of matters of fact arise only when the evidence is susceptible of only one reasonable inference, or from a negative standpoint, when from the evidence a reasonable inference of the existence of the essential fact would not be drawn by any reasonable mind.

I shall consider the facts, as I should, with every reasonable intendment, most strongly in the plaintiff's favor.

The plaintiff's dwelling house fronted the railroad track on the west side. The distance from the center of the track to the point on the kitchen roof where the fire was located was at least 90 feet. The kitchen, in the rear of the house and furthest from the track, was a gable-end building, with a sharp roof, covered with new shingles. The fire was discovered about 11 o'clock a. m. The plaintiff was in the sitting room and was alarmed by the roaring of the flames. He found the kitchen roof ablaze from the outside. Two passenger trains had passed that morning, one about 10 and the other about 11 o'clock. In about five minutes after the north-bound train had passed at 11 o'clock he heard the roaring of the fire and supposed that it must have been this train that set fire, though he did not know for certain. There was no fire in the stove between 10 and 11 o'clock when he went into the kitchen to draw some tea. He did not build the fire and draw the tea because the wind was too high. There was at the time a very high wind blowing from the house toward the railroad, as the plaintiff himself admits. He admits also that he saw sparks from his burning house going across the field and setting fire on the other side. The church on the other side of the railroad from the house caught fire and was burnt, from sparks flying across the railroad from the burning house. When confronted by the anticipated testimony of witnesses for the defense, among whom was the plaintiff's niece by marriage, who was spending a few days at his house at the time of the fire, to the effect that he attributed the fire to the kitchen stove, he denied making such statements, but added: "If I did, I have forgotten it."

From the foregoing statement of facts, taken entirely from the plaintiff's testimony, I cannot see how any other inference can be drawn than that he has entirely failed to connect the fire with the defendant's engine. As circumstantial evidence, he shows that the kitchen was within 90 feet of the track; that a train passed about five minutes before the alarm; that there was no fire in the stove; that the fire originated on the kitchen roof. It seems incredible that sparks could pass over his house, covered with old shingles, and ignite the kitchen roof covered with new shingles; that in five minutes a spark could produce such a combustion as to alarm him in another part of the house by the roaring of the flames and gain such headway as to be irrepressible. Many of the ordinary indicia in suits for damages on account of communicated fires are conspicuously absent—the absence of spark arresters; drunken or incompetent engineers; use of excessive steam; unusually heavy trains; going up grade; violation of statute; excessive speed; want of repair or defect; stopping of engine; stirring up fire at dangerous places; dropping of coal; emission of sparks, etc.

The fact that upon other occasions plaintiff had seen fire set upon the right of way by sparks from engine is but speaking to an occurrence of known happening; but, assuming that it established the fact that every engine on defendant's line every day and at every point emitted sparks, the plaintiff is met with the insuperable physical impossibility of a spark making headway in the teeth of a gale. The undisputed effect of the wind upon the sparks rising from the plaintiff's burning house is strongly persuasive to my mind that its effect upon the sparks rising from defendant's engine, if there were any, of which there is no evidence, was the same, driving them away from the house instead of towards it.

I therefore think that the motion for nonsuit or directed verdict should have been granted, and dissent from the judgment rendered herein.

MCCOWN-CLARKE CO. v. MULDROW.
(No. 10609.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 13, 1921.)

1. Sales §418(7)—Buyer not required to minimize damage by buying in the market when goods not obtainable.

A buyer, injured by the seller's failure to deliver, must minimize his loss by going into the market and purchasing other goods to supply his needs, but, when the season has passed and he cannot procure the needed goods, the rule does not apply.

2. Sales §181(2)—Evidence of difference in fertilized and unfertilized crops held admissible on question of damages for nondelivery.

When a buyer of fertilizer could not procure other fertilizer on the seller's failure to deliver, evidence as to the difference between the crop on which the fertilizer was to be used and fertilized crops on adjoining land of similar quality worked in the same way was admissible.

3. Appeal and error §221—Allowance of interest not reviewable when not raised in trial court.

Where no question was raised in the trial court as to the allowance of interest on the account sued on, such question cannot be considered in the Supreme Court.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Florence County; James E. Peurifoy, Judge.

Action by the McCown-Clarke Company against A. W. Muldrow. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Whiting & Baker, of Florence, for appellant.

Arrowsmith, Muldrow, Bridges & Hicks, of Florence, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The facts in this case involved in this appeal are as follows: The plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant a quantity of fertilizers. The fertilizers were to have been delivered in March for immediate use. The fertilizers were not delivered until June. The defendant, by answer, set up the failure to deliver in the contract time and damages caused by the delay. The defendant offered to show the difference between the crops made on adjoining land of similar quality, worked in the same way and with the same seasons, on which the fertilizers were used in March, and the yield on his land on which the delayed fertilizers were used. The trial judge excluded the testimony on the ground that the measure of damages was the difference between the contract price and the price at the time of delivery specified in the contract.

[1, 2] I. To this ruling exception was taken. The general rule is beyond question, but it does not apply to this case. It is well settled that when the reason of the rule fails the rule does not apply. One who suffers injury from the violation of his contract must minimize his loss by going into the market and purchasing other goods to supply his needs. When, however, the season has passed and injured party to the contract cannot procure the needed goods, the reason of the rule does not apply, and the rule is not applicable. The allegation is that the defendant could not procure the fertilizer when needed, and he could not minimize his loss.

The testimony offered eliminated the uncertainty usual in such cases, and should have been admitted. The exception that raises this question is sustained.

[3] II. The second question is as to the allowance of interest on the account. The record does not show that this question was raised in the trial court, and it cannot be considered.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). I do not concur in the conclusion of a majority of the court in the disposition of this appeal, and think that the judgment of this court should be as indicated at the foot of this opinion.

This being an appeal from a judgment entered upon a verdict in favor of the plaintiff by direction of the circuit judge, the evidence, and all reasonable inferences therefrom, will be interpreted most strongly in favor of the defendant.

The following conclusions of fact may therefore, for the purposes of this appeal, under the above rule, be drawn from the evidence, it being understood that this is done, not at all as findings of fact, but for this appeal only: Prior to March 1, 1910, the plaintiff and the defendant contracted for the sale and purchase of certain fertilizers, to be delivered by the plaintiff during the month of March; the fertilizer was intended to be used by the defendant upon his farm in the planting of crops which required the application of the fertilizer at the time of planting; which facts were known to the plaintiff, and with reference to which the contract was entered into; the fertilizer was not delivered until June 8th, which was too late for the defendant to make use of it in the manner intended; the defendant testified (quoting from the case): "That, expecting the fertilizer to be delivered upon this order, and relying upon such promise of delivery, he failed to order sufficient other fertilizer until too late to procure delivery of such fertilizer elsewhere;" he planted a considerable part of his lands without properly fertilizing them, on account of the plaintiff's failure to make delivery as agreed.

The defendant offered no evidence as to the difference between the market price of the fertilizer at the appointed time of delivery and the contract price, but, by counterclaim and evidence tendered to support it, claimed that he had been damaged in the sum of $500 by the breach of the plaintiff's contract; this evidence was in the form of testimony of witnesses to the effect that the crops made upon adjoining lands of similar quality, worked in the same way and with the same seasons, when the fertilizer was applied at planting time, were more abundant than the crops of the defendant under the circumstances; objection was sustained by the circuit judge to this testimony, and, there being no other offered evidence of damage, the circuit judge directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of their account with interest.

Two main questions are involved in this appeal: (1) Was there error in directing a verdict in favor of the plaintiff? (2) Should interest have been allowed upon the account?

The first question: The solution of this question depends upon the solution of a subsidiary one, as to the admissibility of certain testimony. The only defense that was set up to the plaintiff's cause of action was a counterclaim for damages alleged to have been sustained by the defendant on account of the plaintiff's breach of the contract to deliver the fertilizer during the month of March, by reason of which he was denied the intended purpose, known to the plaintiff, of applying the fertilizer at the time of planting his crop, which resulted in a serious loss of production. In order to establish this, the only element of damage to which the evidence offered by the defendant pertained, the defendant offered the testimony hereinbefore referred to.

I think that the testimony would have been admissible, if the defendant had properly laid the foundation for it by evidence of other facts essentially necessary, as I shall endeavor to show, to his claim for special damages of this particular nature.

If a buyer purchases goods for delivery at a particular time, for a particular use and not for resale, and the seller has knowledge of such facts, it will be presumed that the parties contracted with reference to those facts, and the special damage which may result to the buyer from the seller's nondelivery, or partial delivery, or delayed delivery, may, under certain circumstances, constitute a proper element of damages.

I assume the facts in this case to be that the defendant bought the fertilizer to be delivered in March; that he intended to use it on his farm by applying it at the time he planted his crops; that the plaintiff knew of and contracted with reference to this purpose; that the fertilizer was not delivered until June; and that the failure to apply the fertilizer at the time of planting resulted in a serious loss of production.

The seller is not responsible to the buyer in damages for this loss of production, unless it can reasonably be inferred that it was a consequence of his breach of the contract, which might or should have been anticipated.

The general rule for the measure of damages resulting from the breach of a contract of sale is the difference between the market value at the time and place of delivery and the contract price. Ordinarily, this risk is what the seller assumes, and which he is charged with having reasonably anticipated. If the buyer should regard this measure as inadequate, and it must be admitted that many instances occur where it would be, and seeks to apply a measure more favorable to himself by resorting to proof of special damages, he must bring himself within the rules which entitle him to special damages; the burden is upon him, the presumption being that the general rule as stated applies.

Assuming, hypothetically, the position of the seller and contemplating the results which would naturally flow from his breach of this contract, results which he should reasonably have anticipated and with which only he is chargeable, I think that they might be thus summarized: I have agreed to deliver the fertilizer to Muldrow in March; I know that he is a farmer and is going to use the fertilizer in making a crop; I know that he intends to apply it at planting time; I know that if he does not do that a serious loss in production will result; if I do not deliver at the stipulated time, the price of fertilizer may be higher than he has agreed to pay me, and that I will have to make up the difference; but there is an open market for fertilizers, and there is no reason that I know of why, if I fail, he may not purchase elsewhere; there is every reason to suppose that, as a serious loss of production will result if he does not apply the fertilizer at planting time, he will not take that loss and will purchase elsewhere.

The evidence does not show that Muldrow ever complained to plaintiff of the delayed delivery, or that he was in any way induced by the statements or promises of the plaintiff to refrain from buying elsewhere; his failure to do so appears from the statement in the case to have been plainly his own voluntary act; "expecting the fertilizer to be delivered upon this order, and relying upon such promise of delivery, he failed to order sufficient other fertilizer until too late to procure delivery of such fertilizer elsewhere." It appears from this that he did order some fertilizer elsewhere, but failed to order enough. Should the plaintiff be charged with anticipating the fact that the defendant would fail to do what he had the right to expect him to do, and which the law required him to do, in order that the damage might be minimized?

The defendant's right to recover the special damages claimed depended absolutely upon his inability to purchase fertilizer elsewhere, or upon his prejudicial delay having been induced by the statements or promises of the plaintiff, of which there is not a particle of evidence. On the contrary, his statement quoted above shows that if he had moved earlier, or had bought a sufficient amount when he did buy, his loss would not have occurred.

The appellant quotes from 2 Sutherland, 2339:

"If a vendor in guano knows that the buyer has ordered it for use as a fertilizer, and fails to deliver a portion of the quantity ordered, and the latter is unable to procure it elsewhere, the seller is liable," etc.

That is the heart of the controversy. I think that this question is absolutely concluded by Gadsden v. Fertilizer Co., 89 S. C. 483, 72 S. E. 15. That was an action for damages for breach of a contract.

"In substance, the complaint alleges: That on January 15, 1910, defendant sold plaintiff five tons of fertilizer at the price of $144.60; that plaintiff paid $68.69, part of the agreed price, and defendant agreed to deliver the fertilizer at Claremont, but failed, after demand, to do so; that, relying upon the defendant's performance of the contract, plaintiff prepared his land and made the other arrangements necessary to plant his crops of corn and cotton; but, by reason of defendant's breach of the contract, he was delayed in planting, and compelled to plant his crops without fertilization, to his damage $250."

The defendant made default and the plaintiff undertook to prove his case to a jury, as the statute requires. He testified that he planted a crop; that he did not make more than half as much as he would have made if the defendant had furnished the fertilizer according to contract; that his damages amounted to $250; and that he paid $68.69 on the account. The circuit judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff for $318.69. The defendant appealed from the judgment by default, and this court declared:

"The complaint in this case fails to state the facts necessary to entitle plaintiff to recover the special damages which were awarded by the verdict. In an action to recover damages for breach of contract, when the damages sought to be recovered are special, it is necessary to allege and prove that defendant had notice, at the time of making the contract, of the special circumstances from which such damages might reasonably be expected to result. Towles v. R. Co., 88 S. C. 501, 65 S. E. 638. The complaint in this case contains no allegation, nor is there any evidence that defendant knew, when the contract was made, of the special use which plaintiff intended to make of the fertilizer, or of any scarcity of fertilizer which would prevent plaintiff from buying what he needed from other dealers, if defendant failed to furnish it. Matheson v. Railway, 79 S. C. 157, 60 S. E. 437."

In the case last cited the court held:

"There is no foundation for special damages. The evidence discloses nothing more than an ordinary shipment of fertilizer, with no notice to the carrier at the time it received the goods of any special use to which it was to be applied, or of such scarcity of fertilizer as to prevent the purchase of two tons of other guano by the plaintiff."

In both of those cases stress is laid upon the fact of absence of notice of the use to which the fertilizer was to be applied, but, as I understand the decisions, they are based upon that as one of the essential elements; the other equally so being that it was a part of the plaintiff's case to show that he could not have supplied himself in open market with goods which the seller contracted to deliver. Wilson v. Scarboro, 169 N. C. 654, 86 S. E. 611; Standard v. Weeks, 6 Ala. App. 161, 60 South. 508; Banks v. Warner, 85 Conn. 613, 84 Atl. 325; Martin v. Bunker, 167 Mo. App. 381, 151 S. W. 984; Smith v. Curry, 148 Ky. 166, 146 S. W. 434.

In 24 R. C. L. 77, the following is a quotation from the case of Bell v. Reynolds, 78 Ala. 511, 56 Am. Rep. 52, strongly relied upon by the appellant:

"Thus in an action for breach of a contract for the sale of guano, which the seller knew was intended for use by the buyer in raising a crop on his plantation, only one-half of the stipulated quantity being delivered, and it being then too late to procure it elsewhere, the measure of damages to the buyer was held to be the difference in value between the crop raised on the land on which the guano was used and that raised on the adjoining land of the same quality and cultivated in the same manner on which the guano was used."

At page 85 of the same volume (24 R. C. L.), referring to the duty of minimizing damages, is the following:

"The general rule that a party injured by breach of contract is bound to protect himself, if he can do so with reasonable exertion, or at trifling expense, and cannot recover from the delinquent party damages which he could, with reasonable effort, have avoided, is applicable in actions by the buyer for the seller's breach with respect to delivery, and this may require that the buyer supply himself by purchases in the general market with the subject-matter of the sale. For example, a party contracts for a quantity of bricks to build a house, to be delivered at a given time, and engages masons and carpenters to go on with the work. The bricks are not delivered. If other bricks, of an equal quality, and for the stipulated price, can be at once purchased on the spot, it would be unreasonable, by neglecting to make the purchase, to claim and receive of the delinquent party damages for the workmen and the amount of rent which might be obtained for the house, if it had been built. And though the same kind of article cannot be obtained in the market, if a reasonable substitute may be obtained, it is the duty of the buyer to do so and thus minimize his special damages."

A fairer, more just rule I cannot imagine. Take this as an illustrative case: A cotton mill contracts for cotton with which to operate its mill; it is deliverable at a certain time; the seller knows that if the mill cannot get cotton it cannot run; he is notified by the mill that unless the cotton be delivered on time the mill will shut down; he contracts with reference to that notice; he fails in delivering and the mill shuts down for 30 days and loses heavily; it appears, however, that the cotton market was flush and that the mill could have gotten immediately upon his default all the cotton needed. Would it be just to countenance the breach of the mill's duty to minimize, annihilate, the damages by going upon the market and procuring the necessary cotton?

I therefore conclude that the defendant utterly failed to lay the foundation for proof of special damages, and that the proffered testimony was properly rejected.

The second question: I do not think that there is the slightest ground for the collection of interest upon the open account sued upon. The demand had not been liquidated, there was no formal account stated, and, if the effort be made to construe it as an account rendered and technically an account stated, this theory would be exploded by the admission upon the trial that the defendant was entitled to a credit upon the account sued on. Wakefield v. Spoon, 100 S. C. 100, 84 S. E. 418, appears to me conclusive of the question.

The opinion declares that the question of the allowance of interest was not raised in the trial court, and cannot therefore be considered by this court. I do not agree to this proposition. The plaintiff moved for a directed verdict; the defendant resisted the motion; the circuit judge directed a verdict for the amount of the account with interest. It must be assumed that the plaintiff moved for what he was allowed, and that the defendant, in resisting the motion, resisted all that was in the motion. I do not understand that the case must show that the appellant objected, either in statement or argument, to the conclusion of the circuit judge, but think that he may appeal from it and reverse it, if he can, in whole or in part.

My conclusion, after a most careful consideration of this appeal, is that the judgment below should be modified by striking out the item of interest, $227.02, and allowing the plaintiff to enter up judgment against the defendant for $380.06, with interest at 7 per cent. from the date of the verdict. The defendant, having thus gained a substantial benefit by his appeal, would be entitled to the costs and disbursements of appeal.

PINSON v. BOWLES et al. (No. 10608.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 18, 1921.)

1. Trial \S 25(16) — Right to open and close waived, where not claimed.

Though under the pleadings defendants were entitled to open and close, yet where the right was not demanded until after plaintiff had begun its opening, defendants cannot complain.

2. Appeal and error \S 1046(3)—Where after denying right to open and close, court offered defendants right to reply to plaintiff's argument, error was cured.

Though under the pleadings defendants were entitled to open and close, and that right was denied them, yet where the court offered to allow them to reply to plaintiff's argument, the error, if any, was cured.

3. Trial \S 295(1) — Charge not objectionable where as a whole it was correct.

Appellants cannot complain of the charge, where they were not prejudiced, and the charge as a whole was correct and applicable to the evidence.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County; T. S. Sease, Judge.

Action by E. L. Pinson against M. G. Bowles and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Grier, Park & Nicholson, of Greenwood, for appellants.

Tillman & Mays, of Greenwood, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an action on a note. Defense, failure of consideration. Cause tried before Judge Sease and a jury at the April term of court, 1920, for Greenwood county, and resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff for amount sued for.

Exceptions, six in number, allege error on the part of his honor.

[1, 2] Exception 1 alleges error on the part of his honor in not allowing defendant to open and reply. This exception is overruled. The defendant was not prejudiced by such ruling, and at the time of the ruling no suggestion or intimation was given to the court that the defendant would be prejudiced by such ruling, and by standing by and permitting the plaintiff to offer testimony without claiming the right at the proper time the defendant waived it, but later his honor gave the defendant the right to reply in argument, if they desired it. This certainly cured the error, if any.

[3] Exceptions 2, 3, 4, and 5 allege error in his honor's charge. Taking the charge as a whole, the defendants were not prejudiced, and the charge as a whole was correct, applicable to the facts testified to, and the law of the case.

Exception 6 alleges error in allowing Ellis to testify as to certain facts. This was not prejudicial; the evidence was competent to show the situation at that time.

All exceptions are overruled, and judgment affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and FRASER, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). It is my conviction that the judgment herein should be reversed, and not affirmed, as a majority of this court has concluded.

The action is upon a note signed by the defendant M. G. Bowles and Mrs. M. E. Bowles, dated June 7, 1918, payable on demand to the plaintiff, E. L. Pinson, or order for $255, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum compounded. The answer admits the plaintiff's case upon the pleadings, and sets up an affirmative defense of failure of consideration.

Under the well-established rule in Addison v. Duncan, 35 S. C. 165, 14 S. E. 305, Beckham v. Railroad Co., 50 S. C. 25, 27 S. E. 611, and Thompson v. Insurance Co., 63 S. C. 291, 41 S. E. 464, the defendants were clearly entitled to the opening and reply, both in testimony and argument.

The leading opinion sustains the respondent's position that the defendants, by not making reasonable demand, have waived their right to their privilege, and that in any event the error, if any, was corrected by the circuit judge, after the plaintiff's counsel had made the closing argument to the jury, extending to defendants' counsel the privilege of replying.

I do not think that either position should have been sustained. The record shows that the plaintiff was sworn as a witness, and testified that he lived at Coronaca, was in the tailoring business, and knew the defendants. That was all. Interesting facts, perhaps, but entirely unessential. At this point the defendant's counsel urged his right under the pleadings to open and reply both in testimony and in argument. The circuit judge ruled that the plaintiff had that privilege. No objection appears to have come from the plaintiff's counsel that the claim came too late. There is no time fixed by the rule for asserting the right to open and reply, but in reasonable justice to the opposing side it should not be allowed where the delay in asserting it may have put him to a disadvantage. I imagine that if the right should be asserted after the first witness may have been sworn and before he gives any testimony at all, the proponent of such witness could not complain, and the claim would be in time. The same result should follow if the witness has given no testimony pertinent to the case.

In the case of Barnett v. Gottlieb, 98 S. C. 180, 82 S. E. 406, the defendant's counsel was allowed the opening and reply in the argument, when under the rule the plaintiff's counsel had that right. The court says:

"It is true that the record fails to disclose that the plaintiff claimed his right, but it was the duty of the court to enforce the rules [rule 59, circuit court], and the burden is on the respondent to show waiver of this privilege on the part of the appellant, and no attempt is made to do this."

In view of the failure of the plaintiff's counsel in the case at bar to raise objection to the timeliness of the claim, or to show any prejudicial effect upon his client's rights, at that stage, to allow it, and of the evident discussion and decision of the question upon its merits, I do not think that the defendant can be held to have waived his right. In the Barnett Case the court reiterates:

"It was his [the circuit judge's] duty to enforce the rule as to the plaintiff's right to open and close. * * * He had no right to suspend or change rule 59 of the circuit court."

I think that it is impossible to conclude that the offer of the circuit judge, when court convened the next morning, the arguments for plaintiff and for defendant having been concluded the afternoon before, to allow the defendant's counsel to reply in argument, cured the error in allowing the plaintiff to open and reply in the testimony. It is universally conceded that to open and reply is a right, and not merely a privilege, and that an improper denial of the right is ground for reversal. But waiving for the moment this ground of appeal, and coming to the points which more nearly affect the merits of the controversy, the conceded facts, as I gather them are as follows: It appears that prior to June 7, 1918, the plaintiff Pinson, had made a contract with the Duplex Chair Company of Chicago, for the purchase of 300 chairs at $8.50 each. f. o. b. Chicago, and had paid $510 on account thereof. He expected to sell the chairs at $22.50 each, and realize a profit of $4,200, less freight and expenses. On June 7, 1918, he agreed to let the defendant M. G. Bowles in upon this roseate dream, and they entered into a written contract. The contract recites the above-stated facts, and provides that in consideration of the payment by Bowles of $255 of the $510 which had been paid by Pinson on the chair contract, Bowles was to receive one-fourth of the net profits of the sales of the chairs and Pinson three-fourths, Bowles bearing his proportionate share of the freight and cost of sale. Accordingly Bowles executed the note sued upon, dated June 7, 1918, payable on demand, for $255, with 8 per cent. compound interest, and his wife signed it with him.

The contract does not specifically state who was to sell the chairs, or within what time they were to be sold. The testimony of both the plaintiff and the defendant Bowles, however, leaves no room for doubt that the chairs were to be sold by Pinson. Bowles further testified that it was also a part of their agreement that Pinson would retain his half interest in the contract. Pinson denies this, and in admitting that he was expected to sell the chairs, qualified it with the limitation, "if he could." Whether in his "desire to associate the said M. G. Bowles in the sale of said chairs" (see contract), a scheme which in its hopes and results suggests the visions of a Mulberry Sellers, he so limited the attractions to Bowles, is a matter that the jury may well have considered.

Notwithstanding the written contract with Bowles and his agreement to sell the chairs, on the very next day, June 8, 1918, Pinson concluded a contract with one Graham Smith, in almost the identical terms of his contract with Bowles, and relating to the same Chicago chair contract, except that in the Smith contract, Pinson specifically obligated himself to sell the chairs, and to spend at least 12 months, at his own expense, in doing so.

It is significant that in the Smith contract, which was executed the day after the Bowles contract, Pinson allowed Smith one-fourth of the net profits, and reserved three-fourths for himself. Having already allowed Bowles one-fourth, and by the Smith contract allowing him one-fourth, there necessarily remained for Pinson only one-half; which is entirely consistent with Smith's statement that he did not know that Bowles had acquired an interest, and with the conviction in my mind that Pinson did not intend that he should know.

It is impossible for me to determine, even if called upon to do so, the interests which Bowles and Smith respectively acquired in the Chicago contract. The terms of their respective contracts afford no definite solution, and the conflicting testimony of Bowles, Smith, and Pinson makes it more obscure. According to Bowles, he bought a half interest; according to Smith he bought a half interest; according to Pinson he sold a fourth interest to each of them, retaining a half interest for himself. A possible and plausible theory is that Bowles bought a half interest, Pinson retaining the other half, and taking three-fourths of the profits for his services in selling the chairs against Bowles' one-fourth; and that the same trade was made with Smith, leaving Pinson where he evidently desired to be, completely out of the then questionable venture, so far as obligations were concerned, getting back all he had put in it, and retaining an interest to the extent of one-half of the profits.

The testimony is silent as to what has become of the Chicago contract, except that Pinson had shipped to him four of the 300 chairs contracted for, sold them for about $10 apiece, instead of $24.50, and pocketed that small dust of the balance. He testified that he went to Union and made an honest effort to sell the chairs, but could not do so.

I think that the second exception should be sustained. It is a question of contract, not of injury to Bowles. If Pinson, as a part of his contract with Bowles, agreed to retain the remaining interest, and did not do so, but disposed of it to Smith, he has broken his contract, and is not entitled to recover anything upon it, regardless of whether the breach injured Bowles or not. The charge imposed the burden upon Bowles to show injury to himself by reason of the sale to Smith, a matter entirely foreign to the issue of compliance with the contract. According to Bowles' contention, the sole inducement of the contract on his part was the retention by Pinson of his interest, and his undertaking to dispose of the chairs. He had the right to impose the personal element as a condition, and if Pinson agreed to it he cannot complain and now seek a compliance by Bowles of his stipulations when he has violated his.

I think also that the second of the exceptions numbered 2, on page 23 of the case, should be sustained. There was nothing in the contract, or in the evidence, or in the contention of counsel for the defendant, that would suggest the idea of time being of the essence of the contract. Bowles' testimony was to the effect that it was a part of the contract that Pinson should sell the chairs. If he so engaged, it became a condition upon his recovering upon the contract, unless his performance was prevented by the act of the defendants or by other causes which would excuse him. If he undertook to sell something that could not be sold, that was his misfortune. 3 Elliott on Contracts, § 1891.

BOYLESTON v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. CO. et al. (No. 10598.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 11, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ¶736 — Exceptions should not contain two questions.

An exception should not contain two questions.

2. Appeal and error ¶1001(1)—Verdict supported by evidence not disturbed.

A verdict of a jury finding that an easement had been lost by nonuser which is supported by evidence will not be disturbed.

3. Railroads ¶82(6)—Easement lost will not be protected by injunction.

Where a railroad company by nonuser had lost its easement of right of way, it has no rights to be protected and enforced by the equitable remedy of injunction.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Orangeburg County; H. F. Rice, Judge.

Action by W. C. Boyleston against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Moss & Lide, of Orangeburg, and Lyles & Lyles, of Columbia, for appellants.

T. M. Raysor and Wolfe & Berry, all of Orangeburg, and E. B. Friday, of North, for respondent.

FRASER, J. Levi A. Gleaton owned a tract of land near the present town of North, in Orangeburg county. He conveyed a strip of land to South Bound Railroad 50 feet wide (25 feet on either side of the center of its track) across his land. In addition thereto his deed contained the following:

"And for value received I also grant, bargain, sell and convey to the South Bound Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, one-half (½) acre of my said lands, that the company may select for a depot, also an additional strip or piece of land 75 feet wide on either side of the above-named right of way, and running the full length of said right of way, for the purpose of building side tracks and depot yards on the same. If the above-mentioned one-half acre and the additional 75-foot strips are not used for the purposes mentioned, they do not vest in the said railroad company."

This deed was executed in 1891. Through successive conveyances 16 acres of the land of Levi A. Gleaton came to the plaintiff, Boyleston, and the rights of the railroad to the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. The record shows that the successive owners of this 16-acre tract made improvements thereon, consisting of houses, fences, etc., within the 100 feet from the center of the railroad. The railroad did not locate its station on the Gleaton land, but some distance away, how far away is not clear. About 1902 the employees of the railroad undertook to put up some telegraph poles on this land, but on complaint of the then owner to the railroad authorities the poles were removed. In February, 1918, the defendant constructed a spur track on this land then owned by plaintiff, who has since sold the land to another. This action was brought for damages for trespass and to enjoin the further use of the land. The defendant undertook to justify the taking of the land under its deed from Gleaton. The plaintiff claimed that the deed never authorized the taking, but, if it had done so, the defendant had abandoned its right, or had lost it by the adverse possession of Dr. McElveen, one of the intermediate holders.

When the case was called for trial, on motion of the defendant and over the protest of the plaintiff, the trial judge submitted to the jury questions to be answered by them. One set of questions was as to the ownership of the land at the time the action was commenced, and the other as to the amount of damages, if any. The jury found no damages. In order to avoid any uncertainty, his honor submitted to the jury, without objection, another question, to wit:

"Has the railway company, by abandonment or by adverse possession, lost its right or easement to use the 75-foot strip for side tracks or for railroad purposes?"

To this question the jury answered "Yes." The defendant moved, notwithstanding this finding, for an injunction restraining the plaintiff from interfering with the construction and operation of tracks on the land. His honor refused the motion and in the order confirmed the findings of fact by the jury. From that order the defendant appealed, with one exception, to wit:

"Because his honor the presiding judge having charged the jury as follows, to wit: You have heard all the facts in the case, and it is for you to say from all the facts and circumstances whether or not the railroad did abandon their easement. I want to say this to you, I want to keep the case as straight as I can before you, it is on the plaintiff in the case to show his right. The deed does convey the easement to the railroad company, and when the plaintiff comes in and claims against this easement, it is incumbent on him to prove, to show, that the railroad company had lost its easement by adverse possession or abandonment. 'Dr. Boyleston has admitted that he does not longer own the land. So far as the possession is concerned he is out of court. He admits that he has sold it and has conveyed it to other people. That being so, the question you will decide is the question of damage. In order for you to determine that you have to determine whether at the beginning of this action he was in possession of the property. In order to make it as plain as I can I have submitted some inquiries for you to pass on. I had better first take up the requests of the defendant'—and having submitted to the jury the questions whether the plaintiff was damaged by extending the spur track over the lands in question, and the jury having found in response thereto that the plaintiff had suffered no such damage, but in response to the third query submitted, 'Was the plaintiff entitled to recover against the railroad company the land in dispute at the time of the commencement of this action?' and the jury having found in response thereto 'Yes,' the case became entirely one on the equity side of the court upon the affirmative demand in the defendant's answer for a permanent injunction against the plaintiff and those claiming under him, restraining him and them from interference with the defendant railway company and those claiming under it in the use and occupation of the spur track in question, or from building other spur tracks upon the land in question within 100 feet from the center of its main line, and his honor should have held that the verdict of the jury was a mere expression of opinion as to what were the rights of the parties at the time of the bringing of the action, and should have held that there was no evidence to show that the railroad company had lost by abandonment or by the statute of limitations the right conferred upon it by the Gleaton deed to build the spur track in question when it should become necessary or convenient for it to do so, for the purposes specified in the Gleaton deed, and should have decreed a permanent injunction for the said railway company."

[1] It is very manifest that this exception, in violation of the rule, contains two questions, to wit: Was there any evidence of abandonment? and should the injunction have been granted, notwithstanding the verdict? The court will not enforce the rule in this case and consider them ex gratia.

[2] I. The record does not show a motion for nonsuit or a directed verdict, but, even if they had been made, they could not have prevailed, as there was abundant evidence to sustain the finding.

[3] II. When the jury found that the right of the defendant was gone, and that finding was affirmed by the trial judge, the basis of the equity issue (if there was an equity issue) was out of the case. It needs no authority to show that an injunction must be based on some existing right. The court cannot, by injunction or otherwise, protect an easement that does not exist.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS, and COTHRAN, JJ., concur.

COTHRAN, J. I concur on the ground that the issues of fact, the foundation of the defendant's claim to equitable relief, having been adversely decided by the jury, and not set aside by the presiding judge, this court is without jurisdiction to review such findings. CITY OF SUMTER v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. et al.
(No. 10604.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 13, 1921.)

I. Limitation of actions — 14—Provision in bond limiting actions to less than statutory period is void.

Under Code Civ. Proc. 1912, § 144, prohibiting a provision in any contract barring suit on a cause of action arising out of the contract if not brought within a period less than the time prescribed by the statute of limitations, an action brought against a surety company on a bond within the period of limitations cannot be dismissed, though it was brought after the date stated in the bond as the latest date on which suit thereunder could be instituted.

2. Venue —22(3)—Individual defendant sued with corporate surety held entitled to change of venue.

In a suit on a bond brought against an individual defendant and a nonresident corporate surety, the action being dismissed as to the surety company, the individual defendant is entitled to have the venue changed to the county of his residence.

Watts, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; H. F. Rice, Judge.

Action by the City of Sumter against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company and George W. Waring. From an order denying the motion of the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company for dismissal of the action against it, and denying the motion of defendant George W. Waring for change of venue, the defendants appeal. Order denying dismissal affirmed; order refusing change of venue reversed.

Wingate Waring, of Columbia, for appellants.

Epps & Levy, of Sumter, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from orders of his honor Judge Rice overruling two motions, the first being made by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company to dismiss the complaint as to it, and the second being by Geo. W. Waring for a change of venue from Sumter county to Richland county, the suit being on a surety bond furnished by Waring to plaintiff.

Waring is principal and defendant company is surety. The plaintiff claims breach of condition of the bond, and asks damages for a specified sum.

There are five exceptions. The first and second exceptions insist that his honor was in error in overruling the motion of defendant company, because it appeared from the bond sued on that it was expressly agreed that after a certain time no action should be, and that the time agreed on and provided was that after February 1, 1917, no action should be, against the surety company, and that no action was commenced until September 24, 1919, or more than two years after the date agreed on by the parties to the contract, after which it was specifically agreed by the plaintiff that the defendant company could not be sued thereon. The complaint alleges that the contract entered into between plaintiff and defendant Waring was July 12, 1911. The bond contained this clause:

"That in no event shall the surety be liable for a greater sum than the penalty of this bond, or subject to any suit, action, or other proceeding thereon that is instituted later than the 1st day of February, A. D. 1917."

The bond was dated November 27, 1911. Under the clause the surety company was released from all liability unless suit was instituted by February 1, 1917. As action was not brought within the time provided for, the contract, as to the liability of the surety company, is at an end. The parties themselves agreed on a time limit less than the statutory period, and this they had the right to do, and must be bound thereby.

The contract entered into was reasonable and founded upon a good consideration. The surety company has a right to protect itself and prescribe a reasonable limit to its liability as to time, and, if the other side accepts this, both parties are bound to adhere to the contract as made, and his honor was in error in not granting motion of surety company.

I see no reason why parties should not contract as they did, but, even if they did not, suit was brought in six years after bond was made, and in any view of the case plaintiff cannot recover as to surety company.

It therefore follows that, as the complaint should be dismissed as to the surety company, and the sole defendant left in the cause is Geo. W. Waring, and he lives in Richland county, his motion to change the venue to Richland county from Sumter county will have to be granted.

Orders appealed from are reversed.

GARY, C. J. (concurring and dissenting).
[1] Section 144 of the Code is as follows:

"No clause, provision or agreement in any contract of whatsoever nature, verbal or written, whereby it is agreed that either party shall be barred from bringing suit upon any cause of action arising out of said contract if not brought within a period less than the time prescribed by the statute of limitation, for similar causes of action, shall bar such action, but the same may be brought notwithstanding such clause, provision or agreement if brought within the time prescribed by the statute of limitations in reference to like causes of action."

This action was brought within the time prescribed by the statute of limitations, in reference to similar causes of action, to wit, six years. Therefore it was not barred.

[2] I, however, concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice WATTS that the venue should be changed to Richland county.

(115 S. C. 439)

CALHOUN v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al.
(No. 10503.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 11, 1920.)

1. Railroads ¶5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Corporation not suable for injuries occasioned during federal control.

During the time a railroad was operated by the federal government for its own purposes, and not for the benefit of the corporation, though under a contract to pay the corporation therefor, the corporation is not liable for injuries to a passenger occasioned by negligence of the government's servants operating its trains.

2. Appeal and error ¶854(2)—Wrong reason for right decision does not require reversal.

That the trial judge assigned the wrong reason for an order is not reversible error if the order was right.

3. Railroads ¶5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Director General properly substituted as defendant.

Where the cause of action for the death of a passenger arose and the action was begun while the railroad was operated by the federal government, but while the latter had authorized actions to be maintained against the corporation, the corporation could have the suit against it dismissed only by proper proceedings to have the Director General of Railroads substituted as defendant under the order made after the institution of the suit.

4. Railroads ¶5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Court had jurisdiction, though injuries were caused by servants of federal Director General.

A court is not deprived of jurisdiction of an action against a railroad corporation by the fact that the evidence showed that the injuries were caused by the servants of the Director General of Railroads, and not by the defendant corporation.

5. Railroads ¶5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Judgment as against Director General allowable.

A railroad company sued for the death of a passenger is not entitled to a nonsuit because the evidence showed conclusively that the negligence causing the death was that of the agents of the Director General of Railroads, and not of the defendant, where suit was properly begun against the railroad company under the law then existing, and the Director General had not been properly substituted as defendant, but a judgment can be entered which would not affect the defendant corporation, but would operate as one against the Director General.

6. Railroads ¶5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Punitive damages not recoverable against government.

A judgment against a railway company for death of a passenger occasioned by the negligence of the servants of the Director General of Railroads is in effect against the government, and punitive damages cannot be recovered against the government.

7. Appeal and error ¶1173(1)—Punitive damages allowed against government and individuals must be set aside as to both.

In an action against a railroad company and its employees for the death of a passenger, where the judgment for punitive damages as against the railroad company was in effect a judgment against the government, and therefore invalid, the judgment for punitive damages must be set aside also against the other defendants.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Action by J. A. Calhoun, as administrator of the estate of J. A. Calhoun, Jr., against the Southern Railway Company, J. C. Meredith, and others. Judgment for the plaintiff, and the named defendants appeal. Affirmed as to actual damages, and reversed as to punitive damages, and new trial awarded as to such damages unless plaintiff shall remit all punitive damages.

Frank G. Tompkins, of Columbia, and Lee & Moise, of Sumter, for appellants.

L. D. Jennings, A. S. Harby, and John H. Clifton, all of Sumter, for respondent.

FRASER, J. [1] This is an action for damages for death by the wrongful act. The deceased was a passenger on train No. 18, on the 25th of February, 1918. Train No. 18 was followed by train No. 42. Train No. 18 stopped to fix the air brakes, and the conductor sent a brakeman back to stop train No. 42. The brakeman did not put out the required signals, and train No. 42 ran into train No. 18 and killed the deceased, J. A. Calhoun, Jr. On the date of the tragedy the Southern Railway was operated under government control. On the day of the accident and at the commencement of this action, the government had constituted the railroads its agents to defend such actions as this. See Grant v. Director General of Railroads, 114 S. C. 89, 102 S. E. 854. The railroads were not operating their roads. The government had taken complete possession and were operating them, not for the benefit of the corporations, but for the public good. The railroad companies did not resist. It was useless to do so. They simply submitted to the inevitable. It is true there was a contract between the government and the railroad companies, but the possession and control was not by virtue of the contract, but by the power of the government. This change produced much uncertainty and confusion. It took some time to adjust matters. The government at first directed suits to be brought against the companies. This was merely for convenience. In times of invasion the enemy governments take charge of railroads in the invaded country and operate them. It is manifest that a company whose property was in the hands of an enemy cannot be held responsible for damages caused by the enemy. The fact that the railroads were in the hands of, and were being operated by our own government, does not change the legal status. The possession, operation, and control was as completely beyond corporate control in the one case as in the other.

After a time, between the commencement of this action and the trial of the cause, the government directed new suits to be brought directly against the Director General, and not against the corporations, and added that:

"The pleadings in all such actions at law, suits in equity, or proceedings in admiralty, now pending against any carrier company for a cause of action arising since December 31, 1917, based upon a cause of action arising from or out of the operation of any railroad or other carrier, may on application be amended by substituting the Director General of Railroads for the carrier company as party defendant and dismissing the company therefrom."

[2] When this case was called for trial, the defendant Southern Railway moved to substitute the Director General for itself. The substitution was refused, on the ground:

[3] (1) That, notwithstanding the federal control, the Southern Railway was still liable. This was error. The fact that his honor assigned the wrong reason for his order does not make it reversible error. The Southern Railway had the right to have the case dismissed as to itself and the Director General substituted. This did not give a retroactive effect to the order. The action was properly commenced. The order allowed the defendant the right to be dismissed. That referred to the future conduct of the case. The substitution must be had by due process, as set forth in Grant v. Director General. There was no showing that the Director General could have been made a party at the time of the hearing. There was no showing that proper proceedings had been taken to substitute the Director General. The government order did not allow a simple dismissal of the defendant corporation, but a substitution of one for the other. The government could have refused to be sued. It had the right to provide the method to be pursued, and did provide a substitution, and the record does not show that the proper steps had been taken. Unless the Southern Railway took the proper steps to have itself dismissed, the dismissal could not have been ordered.

[4] (2) This appellant appeals because the court had (it is claimed) no jurisdiction, in that the record shows it is not responsible for the death, in that it was not operating its road. That did not affect the jurisdiction. If it did, then a verdict for defendant would in all cases deprive the court of jurisdiction, and deprive the defendant in future litigation of the plea of res adjudicata.

[5] (3) The defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that the record shows conclusively that the negligence was the negligence of the agents and servants of the Director General, and not of this defendant. That was true, but we have seen the judgment would not affect the defendant company individually, but would operate as a judgment against the Director General. Suits in that form had been authorized, and the substitution had not been legally made.

[6, 7] (4) As to punitive damages: We have held that punitive damages are not recoverable against the government. The judgment against the railway company is in effect a judgment against the government; therefore, in so far as it awards punitive damages against the company, it cannot be sustained. And it cannot be sustained against the other defendants, on the principle decided in Webber v. Jonesville, 94 S. C. 189, 77 S. E. 857. But plaintiff has the right to pursue the other defendants for such damages. Therefore there must be a new trial as to punitive damages, if plaintiff be advised to pursue Locklair and Meredith for such damages.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court as to actual damages be affirmed, and that it be reversed as to punitive damages, and a new trial be had as to punitive damages, unless plaintiff shall remit on the record all punitive damages recovered within 20 days after the filing of the remittitur in the circuit court, in which event the judgment will stand affirmed.

STATE v. ENGLISH. (No. 10601.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 11, 1921.)

I. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 720(9)—Exception to argument of solicitor held not to avail defendant.

In a prosecution for murder resulting in conviction of manslaughter, defendant's exceptions based on the solicitor's argument to the jury that a report in the community, started by defendant, that deceased had been in defendant's watermelon patch at some time prior to the immediate difficulty operated to deprive defendant of the right of self-defense, held not availing to defendant, because assuming the fact that the accusation of deceased by defendant was without intention or expectation of provoking a difficulty; such issue was to be determined by the jury, and not by the court.

2. Homicide §309(1)—Instruction giving example of manslaughter not misleading.

In a prosecution for murder resulting in a conviction of manslaughter, instruction giving the jury as an example of manslaughter a killing under provocation of an assault, held not erroneous, there being no reasonable supposition that the allegations in any manner misled the jury.

3. Homicide §112(2)—Instruction that self-defense not available to person who provokes difficulty by opprobrious language not erroneous.

In a prosecution for murder resulting in conviction of manslaughter, instruction that the true rule is that self-defense is not available to a person who uses language so opprobrious as to be calculated to bring on a difficulty, and which does actually contribute to the bringing on of a physical encounter, etc., held not erroneous.

Cotran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Fairfield County; T. S. Sease, Judge.

Will English was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Defendant's exceptions follow:

(1) That his honor erred in permitting the solicitor, over the twice-repeated objections of defendant's counsel, to argue to the jury that the defendant had started a report in the community that the deceased had been in defendant's watermelon patch; that, by starting such a report, he was at fault in bringing on the difficulty, and could not claim the protection of the law of self-defense—the error being: (a) That such a statement by defendant, made some time prior to the immediate difficulty, without any intention or expectation of provoking a difficulty, could not operate to deprive him of the right of self-defense, and such argument was therefore improper, and highly prejudicial to the defendant; (b) that under such a construction of the law, and ruling by his honor upon defendant's objection to such argument, the jury would have been compelled to find the defendant guilty, even though they believed that he had established a clear case of self-defense in so far as the immediate difficulty was concerned.

(2) That his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: "Now, to give you an example of what manslaughter is, it might be well to give you an example of what murder is, contrasting the two. If a person assaults you, not necessarily battery, if he strikes at you within striking distance, or whether he is within striking distance or not, and you then and there, by reason of the sudden heat and passion, resist the assault, strike, and kill him, that would be manslaughter"—the error being that such charge tended to lead the jury to believe that one has no right to resist, under any circumstances, an unprovoked assault upon himself.

(3) That his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: "I charge you, gentlemen, that the true rule is that self-defense is not available to a person who uses such language, so opprobrious as is calculated to bring on a difficulty and which does actually contribute to the bringing on of a physical encounter. The general doctrine that mere words will not justify blows is involved in that rule. The true rule is that self-defense is not available to a person who uses language so opprobrious as is calculated to bring on a difficulty, and which really does contribute to a physical encounter"—the error being: (a) That such charge was not warranted by the testimony; (b) that such charge could only have been intended by his honor to answer the objections urged by defendant's counsel to the argument of the solicitor pointed out in the first exception, there being no other testimony in the case to which such charge was applicable, and that thereby the defendant was deprived of the right of self-defense; (c) that under such a construction of the law, one who has made any remark reflecting upon another, without any intention that such remark should be repeated, would have no right to defend himself against an otherwise unprovoked assault subsequently made upon him.

McDonald & McDonald, of Winnsboro, for appellant.

J. K. Henry, Sol., of Chester, for the State.

GARY, C. J. The defendant was tried on an indictment, charging him with the murder of Roland Shelton. He admitted the killing, but pleaded self-defense. The jury found him guilty of manslaughter, and he appealed from the sentence imposed on him. The record contains this statement:

"It appears from the testimony that the deceased, in company with his father, a brother, and two friends, were sitting down near the public road on the plantation of T. W. Traylor, in Fairfield county, and near by was a well, which was used by the tenants on the plantation. Will English, a tenant on the place, came down to the well with two of his little children and drew them a bucket of water, and then started on down the road in the direction of the farm, which he was cultivating. He was carrying a shotgun, which he stated was for the purpose of shooting crows. His route led him by the party, of which the deceased was a member, and when opposite them he exchanged greetings with them. Brice Shelton, a brother of the deceased, then said to English that he had heard that English had accused him of going into his watermelon patch. The defendant denied this, and Brice Shelton told him that if he had not made such an accusation that it was all right. Then Roland Shelton, the deceased, took up the conversation, and there is a conflict in the testimony as to just what passed, but this started the dispute which led up to the killing. The testimony in this connection is set out in the record."

Turning to the testimony we find that Brice Shelton, brother of the deceased, thus testified:

"Ed Stevenson, Bub, Virgil Jones, and Roland and myself, were sitting down on a pile of logs in front of our door, and we were laughing and talking. Will English come up with his gun, and I says to him, I hear he had me accused of going into his watermelon patch; he said no, he didn't say it, and I said if he didn't say it, it was all right. My brother, Roland, asked him, 'I hear you got me accused of going in there.' Will, he walks off a few steps, and he turned around and said: 'Yes, damn you, I said it and I stick to what I said.' Then Will and Bub started toward one another."

The record also contains this statement:

"During the course of the solicitor's argument to the jury, he argued that the defendant had circulated the report in that community that the deceased had been in defendant's watermelon patch, and therefore the defendant was at fault in bringing on the difficulty. Defendant's counsel, in the midst of the solicitor's argument, objected to such argument, upon the ground that this provocation was too remote, that the defendant was not thereby deprived of the right of self-defense and after listening to arguments by counsel on both sides, the presiding judge overruled the defendant's objection. The solicitor then argued to the jury that the defendant had circulated a report in the community that the deceased had been in his watermelon patch, and that when the deceased had asked him about it, he at first denied it, and had then repeated the accusation to his face with curses. The argument was that one who charged another with being a thief, and repeated it to his face in the manner described in the testimony, could not claim to be without fault. Defendant's counsel also objected to this argument, but their objection was also overruled."

[1] The defendant appealed upon exceptions which will be reported. Neither subdivision (a) nor (b) of the first exception can be sustained, as the appellant assumes the fact that the accusation of the deceased by the defendant was without any intention or expectation of provoking a difficulty. Such issue was to be determined by the jury, and not by the court.

[2] The second exception must be overruled, as it can not be reasonably supposed that the illustration in any manner whatsoever misled the jury.

[3] The third exception cannot be sustained, as the charge of his honor the presiding judge is sustained by the cases of State v. Rowell, 75 S. C. 494, 56 S. E. 23, and State v. Lee, 85 S. C. 101, 67 S. E. 141, 137 Am. St. Rep. 869, and was applicable to the facts of this case.

Appeal dismissed.

WATTS and FRASER, JJ., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). I think that there was serious prejudicial error in the rulings and charge of the circuit judge in this case, and that there should be a new trial.

The circumstances of the homicide, from the state's point of view, were as follows:

The defendant, English, and the deceased, Shelton, were tenants upon the same tract of land, having separate farms, the deceased, a young man, working with his father; some one had invaded the defendant's watermelon patch, and he had told others that Shelton was the marauder; on the day of the homicide the deceased, with his father, brother, and two friends were sitting upon a pile of logs near the public road, talking; near the road also was a well which was customarily used by the tenants; English came down the road with his children to the well, and drew water for them; he was carrying a shotgun upon his shoulder; after he had drawn the water he went over to where the party were sitting on the logs, and addressed them pleasantly, remarking on the weather; the brother of the deceased asked English if he had accused him of the depredation referred to; he denied it, and the brother expressed his satisfaction with the denial; the deceased then made the same inquiry as to himself; English at first denied that also, but later admitted the accusation, and repeated it; hot words passed between them, and they started towards each other; Shelton made some kind of a motion with his hand in front of English's face, laughing towards the others who were still seated upon the log; English struck at Shelton with the butt of his gun; Shelton dodged the blow, and threw a rock at English, striking him on the head; English reversed his gun, put the butt up to his shoulder, and fired, while Shelton had turned.

The defendant pleaded self-defense.

It appears that the solicitor, in his argument to the jury, contended that as the defendant had upon another occasion, or other occasions, circulated a report that the deceased had been in his watermelon patch, he was not on that account free from fault in bringing about the difficulty which terminated fatally, and was not, therefore, entitled to rely upon his plea of self-defense in the circumstances immediately attending the homicide. The defendant's counsel objected to that line of argument on the ground that the provocation was too remote; the circuit judge heard argument upon the objection, and in the presence of the jury overruled the objection.

The appellant contends that the overruling of the objection amounted to an approval of the position taken by the solicitor, and, having been made after argument, in the presence of the jury, had quite the effect of a distinct charge to the jury upon that point. I do not think so, necessarily. The ruling of the circuit judge is not given, and possibly the ground taken by him for overruling the objection was that it involved the decision by him of a question of fact; "that the provocation was too remote," which would have been correct. If the objection had been based upon the entire absence of any evidence to connect the circulation of the report in an intentional way on the part of the defendant with the actual altercation, I think the objection would have been timely.

In my opinion, there was not a particle of testimony tending to show, either before the altercation or at the time of its occurrence, that the watermelon episode had any such causative force in precipitating the difficulty as would debar the defendant of his plea of self-defense; and that the injection of the principle of "provoking the difficulty" into the case was entirely irrelevant, and seriously prejudiced the rights of the defendant. That it was causative in a sense, there can be little doubt; it was what made the young man mad, what made him begin the difficulty with the defendant, after the latter had turned to leave the gathering which he had approached in perfect good humor; but there is absolutely nothing to show that the defendant said or did anything prior thereto, or at the time, that was intended, or even calculated, to provoke the deceased to attack him.

Reviewing his conduct prior to the day of the encounter, all that we find is that his property had been stolen and that he laid the theft upon the deceased by circulating a report to that effect. Surely a man whose property has been stolen has the right to express his suspicion, or his conviction, as to the identity of the thief, without being charged with the intention of provoking the thief to attack him, and thus, under a deceptive plea of self-defense, afford him an opportunity of killing him. If the suspicions be well grounded, he certainly has the right to express them; if they be groundless, the sneak is not expecting, certainly not intending, an attack.

In the immediate circumstances of the altercation, the defendant is not shown to have been in any way the aggressor; the deceased was angered by the report, and called upon the defendant for a repudiation of it. If the defendant had made the accusation, and believed it to be true, he was not called upon, in order to avoid an imminent attack by Shelton, to deny or recant his accusations; and I do not think that under such circumstances his refusal to deny, and his reaffirmation of the charge, is any evidence of such provocation of the difficulty as should rob him of his right to defend himself from a murderous attack.

I think that the Rowell Case, 75 S. C. 494, 56 S. E. 23, has been given a much wider application than it warrants, though perhaps justified by the apparently unlimited declaration of the law contained in that decision.

As that decision has been construed and applied, there is little difference between it and the charge of the circuit judge which it reversed.

I do not subscribe to the law that any opprobrious epithet calculated to provoke a personal encounter, regardless of the intention of the party applying it, will rob him of the right to defend himself against a murderous attack. The circulation of the most outrageous, mendacious, and slanderous reports against another, will not justify such other in murderously assaulting the slanderer in resentment. Such an assault, resulting fatally, would constitute murder. Against it the slanderer would be permitted to defend himself, to the extent of slaying, if necessary, even though it should appear that the slander was the provocation of the attack. It would be illogical in the extreme to hold that one could not defend himself against an attack which, resulting in his own death, would constitute murder in his assailant.

Even where the insult is applied in the immediate circumstances of the affray, a similar glaring inconsistency appears, which, to my mind, demands a restricted application of the doctrine of "provoking the difficulty" as declared in the Rowell Case. "No words, however opprobrious, will justify an assault," is a doctrine as to which there can be no dispute. If, therefore, the insulted party should resent the insult by slaying the other, it would be murder in him. His attack would be a murderous attack; and to hold that by the simple application of an opprobrious epithet, reasonably calculated to provoke a personal encounter, the party cannot defend himself against an attack which, resulting in his own death, would be murder in the assailant, strikes me as illogical to a degree.

A modified, and perfectly reasonable and consistent statement of the principle, in my opinion, is this:

"If it is an assault, or the menace of one by an overt act, or the provocation of a difficulty with intent to inflict death or great bodily harm in the event it is resisted, made of malice, to bring about that result and enable the provoking party to wreak his vengeance on the assailant, that is an 'aggression' or 'fault,' and a 'provoking of the difficulty,' within the legal sense and meaning of the terms. If the 'combat is provoked,' or 'the occasion to kill is produced,' * * * on this account, with this intent, and for this purpose, the defendant cannot reply upon the plea of self-defense." Fouch v. State, 95 Tenn. 711, 84 S. W. 423, 45 L. R. A. 687.

This is exactly in line with the charge of Judge Watts (now Associate Justice) in the case of State v. Cobb, 65 S. C. 324, 43 S. E. 654, 95 Am. St. Rep. 801:

"If a man makes preparation * * * that way to go and raise a row with the other, with the intention of killing the other if the other resents the insult or strikes him, and he kills him, that is murder."

In State v. Summer, 55 S. C. 32, 32 S. E. 771, 74 Am. St. Rep. 707, the circuit judge had charged the jury:

"The law would say you cannot place your enemy, antagonist, or fellow-being, can't surround him, with such circumstances which you know he would resent, and then mention it to him, bring it up to him to make him fight, just to get to kill him under circumstances which might appear to be sudden and unexpected; the law says that you cannot do that." * * * If although the fight might be sudden, yet if it appears there was a predetermination on the part of the slayer to bring it about, then if he kills, it is murder and not manslaughter."

This court declared "the language of the charge set forth sound, wholesome law."

In State v. Gibbs, 113 S. C. 256, 102 S. E. 333, this court held that prior difficulties between the parties (without reference to who was at fault in those difficulties) did not deprive the defendant of the right of self-defense. The court must have had in mind difficulties in which the defendant was at fault, for if he was not, the matter was not worthy of consideration and would not have been suggested. If this be true in reference to difficulties in which the defendant was at fault, it is an easy step to the circulation of reports as to which he may have been entirely correct. Certainly a prior difficulty in which the defendant was at fault is more calculated to provoke a second difficulty than the circulation of a report in which he was not at fault is to provoke an initial difficulty.

The beauty, to my mind, of this modified doctrine, is its absolute consistency from the standpoint of the result to either party. If the insulting party, under the supposed conditions, should slay the other, he would be guilty of murder; if the insulted party should slay him, he would not be met with the rule that no words will justify an assault, for he would be resisting a murderous assault; he would not be simply resenting an insult by words, but would be defending himself against an attack which, if consummated fatally, would be murder in the other.

"One who insults another by opprobrious words may be bound to anticipate that the person insulted will resent the insult to the extent the law allows, but he is not bound to anticipate that the latter will go to the extent of attempting to take his life; and if such an attack is made, upon no greater provocation than this, and the person thus assaulted kills his assailant, under a reasonable belief that it is necessary to do so in order to save his own life, it is not murder nor manslaughter. If, however, a person provokes an assault by the use of gross insults and obloquy, with the hope and intent that the words will cause the deceased to make an assault upon him, he cannot plead self-defense in justification of the killing." 24 A. & E. 268.

"And it may be stated generally that any act in violation of law, and reasonably calculated to produce the occasion for a killing, amounts to bringing on the difficulty, and bars the right of the actor to plead self-defense." Wharton on Hom. (3d Ed.) § 323.

"The plea of justification in self-defense cannot avail in any case where it appears that the difficulty was sought for and induced by the act of the [defendant] in order to afford him a pretence for wreaking his malice." State v. Starr, 38 Mo. 270; State v. Parker, 96 Mo. 382, 9 S. W. 728.

"To bar a person's right to use a deadly weapon in self-defense, he must have been the originator of the difficulty, must have entered it armed, and must have brought it on intending, if necessary, to use his weapon to overcome his adversary." Hunt v. State, 72 Miss. 413, 16 South. 753.

"Where a person provokes an assault upon himself, for the purpose of securing a pretext for killing his assailant, the assault will furnish no excuse for the killing." State v. Cross, 68 Iowa, 180, 26 N. W. 62.

"Where, on the trial of an indictment for murder, the fact of killing with a deadly weapon was established, a charge to the jury that, if they believed that the defendant sought a quarrel with the deceased in order that he might take advantage of it to kill him, then no danger to himself, thus brought on, would excuse the killing, was held correct." Murphy v. State, 37 Ala. 142.

"Although the slayer provoked the combat or produced the occasion, yet, if it was done without any felonious intent, the party may avail himself of the plea of self-defense." Hash v. Commonwealth, 88 Va. 172, 13 S. E. 398.

"One who provoked an assault by the use of gross insult and obloquy, with the belief and intention that the words would cause deceased to make the assault, cannot plead self-defense." Hays v. Territory, 7 Okl. 15, 54 Pac. 300.

"If he provokes or begins the difficulty with the purpose of taking advantage of the deceased and taking his life, or doing him great bodily harm, then he cannot justify the killing on the ground of self-defense, however imminent the peril became, and the killing is murder in the first degree." State v. Hopper, 142 Mo. 478, 44 S. W. 272.

"The plea of justification in self-defense cannot avail in any case where it appears that the difficulty was sought for and induced by the act of the [defendant] in order to afford him a pretense for wreaking his malice." State v. Partlow, 90 Mo. 608, 4 S. W. 14, 59 Am. Rep. 31.

"Where an assault is brought on a person by his own procurement, or under an appearance of hostility which he himself creates with a view of having his adversary act on it, and he does so act and is killed, the plea of self-defense is unavailing." People v. Glover, 141 Cal. 233, 74 Pac. 745; State v. Sharp, 183 Mo. 715, 82 S. W. 134; People v. Filippelli, 173 N. Y. 509, 66 N. E. 402.

"If one provokes a difficulty in order to be ready prepared to kill another, or inflict serious bodily harm upon him, he cannot justify such killing on the ground of self-defense, although it may subsequently be necessary for him to kill his adversary in order to save his own life." Young v. State, 53 Tex. Cr. R. 416, 110 S. W. 445, 126 Am. St. Rep. 792.

To hold that the circulation of a report accusing another of larceny, would without regard to its truth or falsity, constitute a provocation of the difficulty, would result in this: Any person whose property has been stolen would give expression to his suspicions or conviction as to the identity of the thief, at the risk of being called to account for his words, and upon attack therefor, of being deprived of the right to defend himself from a murderous attack. In other words, he who has given expression to such conviction, under the law as thus expounded, subjects himself, without hope of reprieve, to capital punishment at the hands of the thief. The fact that the thief may be executed will be small consolation to him. If the facts would justify the report, the law makes it the duty of the injured party to cry aloud; it provides the machinery to be set in motion by him for the punishment of the thief. Even if the report be false, it should be made to appear that it was circulated for the purpose or with the reasonable expectation of bringing about a difficulty. In such cases the calumny is usually the work of the skulking coyote.

"The right to defend one's self from a public horsewhipping is not defeated by the circulation of slanders about relatives of the assailant." State v. Bartlett, 170 Mo. 658, 71 S. W. 148, 59 L. R. A. 756.

"Nor is the right to defend one's self against an attack by another defeated by the circulation of slander about relatives of the assailant, or by the publication and circulation of a libel concerning him." Wharton, § 326.

Wharton declares:

"Nor is it necessary that the means used should have been such as were reasonably calculated to provoke a difficulty if the accused intended to provoke a difficulty, and used such means as he thought would provoke it, and they did provoke it, it is all that is necessary." Section 323.

I may say, too, that the unrestricted application of the doctrine announced in the Rowell Case ignores the well-recognized distinction between a perfect and an imperfect self-defense. The former appears when all of the well-known elements of self-defense have been established; the latter, when the defendant has been at fault in bringing on the difficulty, though not with the intention of creating the opportunity to take the other's life or inflicting serious bodily harm.

HUBBARD v. EQUITABLE LIFE ASSUR. SOC. OF THE UNITED STATES. (No. 4170.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 5, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1037—Refusal to remand to rules for process on amended declaration not error, where damages less than in original declaration found.

A case, after being remanded from this court for a new trial, was sent to rules on plaintiff's motion and an amended declaration filed at August rules, which increased the ad damnum only, but on which amended declaration no process was issued; at the following October term defendant appeared and moved to remand the case to rules for process on the amended declaration, which motion the court overruled, and gave the defendant a rule to plead, and thereupon a demurrer to the amended declaration was interposed, and a motion made to strike certain items from the bill of particulars. The demurrer was overruled, and the motion denied. At the following January term the issues were made up and the case tried by a jury, which found for the plaintiff in an amount less than the damages laid in the original declaration. Held: It was not reversible error to refuse the motion to remand the case to rules for process on the amended declaration.

2. Insurance \S 179½—Other policies held admissible on construction of loan agreement in policy.

Where a life insurance policy has been issued with an agreement therein to loan a certain sum to the insured at a fixed rate of interest for a stipulated time, with the policy assigned to the insurer as collateral, and with the provision that upon payment of the interest on the loan, and payment of the premiums on the policy as each becomes due and payable, then the borrower has the option to continue the loan from year to year until maturity of the loan; and the insurer refuses to make such loan otherwise than upon a stipulation waiving notice of intention to cancel the policy upon failure to repay the loan on the date when due, and giving the insurer the right to apply the cash surrender value of such cancellation to the payment of the loan and interest; and the policy holder will not agree to such stipulation unless there is a clause therein to the effect that he shall have at least 30 days' notice of intention to cancel the policy for default in payment of the loan on the day when due, and litigation arises as to the proper construction of the loan agreement of the policy—the policies subsequently issued by the insurer, both before and after said litigation has begun, which define the conditions upon which it will make loans to its policy holders, and which provide for a notice of 30 days of intention to cancel the policy upon failure to pay the loan when due, are admissible in evidence as tending to prove the reasonableness and practicability of the policy holder's construction of the loan agreement in the policy upon which the suit is instituted.

3. New trial §41(2)—Verdict will not be disturbed for improper evidence where jury has disregarded it.

If immaterial or improper evidence has gone to the jury in the progress of the trial, and the court fully instructs the jury that its verdict can be predicated only on a theory which is sustained by proper, relevant, and material evidence, and the verdict is responsive to the court's instructions, and it is clear that the jury has disregarded the immaterial or improper evidence, the verdict should not be disturbed for that reason.

4. Appeal and error §1072—Setting aside verdict for improper evidence which is not prejudicial reversible error.

Where improper or immaterial evidence is admitted and it clearly appears from the whole case, including the court's instructions to the jury, that it could not have produced a different result, and had it been excluded the result would have been the same, it will be reversible error to set aside the verdict on that ground alone.

Error to Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Action by William P. Hubbard against the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States. Verdict for plaintiff was set aside, a new trial granted, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and rendered.

See, also, 95 S. E. 811.

J. Bernard Handlan and G. Alan Garden, both of Wheeling, for plaintiff in error.

Frank W. Nesbitt, of Wheeling, for defendant in error.

LIVELY, J. This case was before this court on error in January, 1918, and is reported in 81 W. Va. 663, 95 S. E. 811, 4 A. L. R. 886. A terse statement of the controversy is there given. It is unnecessary to make a repetition here. A construction of the loan clause in the policy was the main contention on the first trial and in this court. The judgment was reversed and the case remanded because of improper evidence given to the jury. This court decided that the insured, upon being refused a loan, as provided in the loan clause of the policy, upon proper terms, and who then obtained loans elsewhere, upon collateral security of his own, at a higher rate of interest than that set out in the policy, but at the lowest rate obtainable, was entitled to recover the excess of the interest so paid by him over that provided for in the loan clause of the policy, and the reasonable value of his services in securing the loan; but was not entitled to compensation for the use of his securities, used as collateral. Much of the same evidence used at the first trial was necessarily introduced at the last trial, and the main controversy now centers about the admissibility of the evidence submitted to the jury relating to the value of the services of the plaintiff in error in securing a loan of $17,680 from various sources, which sum was the amount he was entitled to borrow from defendant under the loan clause in the policies, at 5 per cent. for a period of years, under certain conditions, with assignment of the policies as collateral. A verdict of $1,822.83 was rendered, January 14, 1919, in favor of the plaintiff, and, on motion of defendant, the court being of the opinion that improper evidence had been introduced, set aside the verdict and granted a new trial, and the plaintiff obtained this writ of error and supersedeas.

[1] At the inception we are confronted with a question of pleading and practice. Upon remand of the case by this court, plaintiff, without notice to defendant and in its absence, successfully moved the circuit court to remand the case to rules, and at August rules, 1918, an amended declaration was filed in the clerk's office on which no process issued. On October 12, 1918, defendant appeared specially and moved the court to again remand the case to rules, because of want of notice, and want of process on the amended declaration. The motion was denied and overruled and exception taken. The defendant in error assigns this ruling of the court as cross-error. The amended declaration only increased the ad damnum. It did not change the form of the action nor the subject-matter of the controversy, and could have been permitted by the court at bar. We can see no injury or prejudice to the defendant by this amendment thus accomplished. It was not taken by surprise. The case was not tried until January 13, 1919, when the verdict returned was for less than the amount laid in the original declaration and writ. Wherein has the defendant been injured? Dabneys v. Knapp, 2 Grat. (Va.) 354.

The controlling question in this record is upon the admissibility of the plaintiff's evidence introduced to show the value of his services in obtaining loans from sources other than the insurance company. What was the value of his services? It is clear that the excess interest (1 per cent.) which plaintiff paid on the amount of loans to which he was entitled, to wit, $17,680, and which loans he obtained from various sources, amounted to $595.23 at the time suit was begun. On this sum he was entitled to interest at 6 per cent. until the date of judgment, which would add thereto $202.52, making in all $803.75. The verdict was for $1,822.43, leaving the sum of $1,019.08 to be accounted for as the value of the services of the plaintiff. Our former decision was that plaintiff could not recover for the use of his own securities used by him as collateral in securing the various loans from the banks. Is there sufficient legal evidence to prove that plaintiff's services, time, and expense in procuring and continuing these various loans were worth $1,019.08? That is the vital question. Witness Tucker testified that the fair compensation of a person in obtaining a loan of $17,680 on good collateral security such as Pennsylvania Railroad stock, Wheeling Steel & Iron Company stock, and other good stock (all being the stock actually pledged by plaintiff) for a year with the privilege of extending the loan at the end of the year, for another year, at the option of the borrower, and at the end of the second year for another year, and so on, for three years more, obtaining the amount in as many as 40 different loans, and looking after 12 renewals, requiring 2 trips to Washington, Pa., the entire transaction covering a period from March, 1911, to January, 1915, would be 5 per cent. of the loan; and witness Mathison said such service ought to be worth $700 or $800. The plaintiff valued such services at $1,000. On the former trial he estimated his services, time, and expenses as worth $500, under the assumption that it had taken 30 transactions, but which he afterwards found to be 40 transactions. In comparing his services with that charged by brokers for like services, under like conditions, he finds that the estimate given in this former evidence, not based on a percentage, was too small. The loan clause in the policies provided that after the policies were three years old the holder at his request would be loaned certain specified sums at 5 per cent., renewable each year for five years, with the policies as collateral security. The defendant failed to comply with this loan contract, and the plaintiff procured loans elsewhere, amounting to $17,680, at 6 per cent., using his own collateral as indicated in the hypothetical questions propounded to witnesses Tucker and Mathison. Upon a calculation of the interest on the average of the value of the services in securing these loans as fixed by these witnesses, and adding thereto the undisputed sum of $808.75, the result will be a few dollars in excess of the verdict. The evidence of these three witnesses is not contradicted. So, if all of the evidence tending to fix a value for the use of the collateral owned by him and pledged to secure these loans be eliminated, there is sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict.

Instruction No. 2, offered by the defendant and given, took out of the case any consideration of the use of such securities as an item of damage to the plaintiff. The learned trial judge was of the opinion that inasmuch as evidence had gone to the jury, over the objection and exception of the defendant, as to what would be the value of services in procuring loans on the insurance policies, on the terms set out in the loan clause, and for the time in which the policies had to run, the defendant was prejudiced thereby, because the plaintiff did not render such service, and the verdict was set aside and a new trial awarded for this reason. And yet instruction No. 7 given for the defendant told the jury that in computing the value of plaintiff's services in procuring the loan, the basis thereof must be the value of his services in procuring the loan on the collateral actually used, and not the value of such services as he would have rendered if he had procured the loan on the insurance policies. This instruction practically told the jury to disregard this evidence which had gone in, and which the court after verdict considered to be error. There was a persistent effort on behalf of the plaintiff to get before the jury evidence on which it could base an item of compensation to him for the use of his securities pledged as collateral in securing these loans, although this court had said that no recovery could be had for the use of such collateral securities; and the court, likewise, in order to remove any impression which such attempt might have had, instructed the jury that no compensation could be allowed for the use of such securities, in defendant's instruction No. 2.

[3, 4] It is clearly the duty of the court to instruct the jury to disregard evidence improperly admitted. Moore v. Harper, 42 W. Va. 39, 24 S. E. 633; Alderson v. Miller, 15 Grat. (Va.) 279; Brooks v. Calloway, 12 Leigh, 466. The introduction of improper evidence in jury trials frequently occurs, and the court, upon perceiving it, will instantly instruct the jury to disregard it. A formal written instruction would be as effective. The instruction to disregard purges the error. A jury must be presumed to possess some discrimination and recollection. A close inspection and study of the evidence given by witnesses Holloway, Mathison, and Marshall will disclose that they did not express any satisfactory opinion on the value of services in securing a loan on the terms set out in the loan clause, with the policies pledged as collateral security therefor. The general tenor of their evidence was to the effect that it would be difficult to negotiate such loans with the life policies as collateral. Plaintiff's theory for introducing this evidence is that it was for the purpose of showing that he did not use these policies in obtaining the loans because of the difficulty in getting the banks to make loans thereon, and the possible higher rate he would have to pay because of the unusual and unsatisfactory security offered; and that he took the better, quicker, and cheaper way of using his own well-known and acceptable stocks. In this way he minimized the damages. It is unnecessary to determine whether this evidence was proper or not, or on what theory, if any, its introduction was justified, as the jury was instructed to disregard it in considering their verdict. We are inclined to hold that this evidence was proper for the purpose of showing why plaintiff could not pledge the policies. From this record we cannot see that defendant was prejudiced by this alleged improper evidence. Hall v. Lyons, 29 W. Va. 410, 1 S. E. 582.

We can see no error in the court's action in refusing to strike out that clause of Local Manager Sweeney's letter of April 8, 1911, to the defendant, which letter informed it that plaintiff criticized the loan agreement based on the policy and would not sign it as prepared, and which clause stated that the loan agreement "had been a great deal complained of and criticized on the part of certain policy holders." This court had already held that the loan agreement insisted on by the defendant was a departure from the policy contract. The reasonableness of the loan agreement was involved, and this evidence of complaint from policy holders only accentuated what had been judicially settled, and could not prejudice defendant's case. Nor can we see injury to the defendant in submitting to the jury excerpts from the subsequent annual reports of the defendant to its policy holders relative to the value and desirability of its liberal policy contracts. Defendant's counsel insists that this evidence was designated to secure punitive damages, on what hypothesis we fail to perceive, but if such evidence could, under any theory, be construed to have that effect, instruction No. 3 given for the defendant told the jury that punitive damages could not be given; and its instruction No. 1 limited the recovery to excess interest paid by plaintiff and reasonable compensation for his time, services, and expenses in procuring the loans, together with interest on these amounts. We do not perceive any punitive damages in the verdict.

[2] After this suit was begun on the policies issued in 1901, a policy was issued on November 26, 1915, to plaintiff which contained a loan provision similar to that contended for by plaintiff, to wit, that upon default the policy holder should have thirty days' notice before forfeiture was declared. This policy was properly put in evidence to prove the reasonableness of plaintiff's contention as to his construction of the 1901 policy contract. The later policy admitted, almost in terms, that plaintiff's construction of the contract sued on was reasonable and practicable.

Defendant insists that the court erred in admitting evidence as to the value of plaintiff's services in obtaining forty different loans, when he testified that he could have borrowed the entire amount at one time on his name and first-class collateral used; that it was plaintiff's duty to minimize the damage caused by the breach in this way. Plaintiff during this time needed much more money than that provided for in the policies, varying from a few thousand dollars up to $100,000. The average of his borrowing during the period was $50,000 or $60,000. He borrowed the money as his necessities required. At one time he borrowed the money for a period at 5 per cent., saving the excess interest to defendant for approximately six months. It must be kept in mind that defendant's contract was to loan a stipulated amount, $17,600, to plaintiff at 5 per cent. for one year with the option to plaintiff to renew at the end of the year, and to continue to renew at his like option for five years, a most advantageous contract to plaintiff; should interest rates go beyond 5 per cent. his contract rate remained, and should the rate become less than 5 per cent. he could exercise his option and discontinue his loan. It would be difficult to obtain that amount of money in a lump sum under such a contract, especially with the policies as collateral. Some of the brokers say that they would not undertake to negotiate such a loan, deeming it practically impossible to do so. We do not think that plaintiff, being required to go into banks for this money on short-time loans secured by his own collateral, would be required to borrow in a lump sum, whether he then needed all the money or not, in order to minimize the defendant's damages. He was borrowing various sums from various sources during that time to meet his varying necessities, totaling possibly 100 transactions. A person usually borrows money as and when he needs it. The plaintiff would not be required to depart from his usual ordinary and prudent methods in order to minimize defendant's damages. Therefore defendant's instruction No. 6, which told the jury that if they believed the plaintiff could have procured the $17,680 loan in one transaction, then it was his duty so to do, and the basis of his recovery for time, service, and expense should be computed on the one transaction, was properly refused.

It is insisted that plaintiff is not entitled to recover more than the excess interest he was compelled to pay. This contention was considered and passed upon on the former writ of error, and will not be considered again. We then held that the reasonable value of plaintiff's services in procuring the loans elsewhere was a proper item of damage. Hubbard v. Assurance Society, 81 W. Va. 663, 95 S. E. 811, 4 A. L. R. 886. Defendant's instruction No. 5, given, told the jury that plaintiff's compensation for time, labor, and expense in obtaining the loans from others to take the place of the sum contracted to be loaned by it, should be limited to that which was reasonably necessary, thus negating its own contention now made that excess interest was the only item of recovery.

Much argument and citation of authorities is contained in the brief for plaintiff on the proposition that he should be compensated for the use of his collateral used to take the place of the insurance policies; and much argument and citation is found in the brief for plaintiff to sustain its contention that plaintiff's recovery should be limited to the excess interest paid, and no account whatever taken of his time, expense, and services in obtaining the loans. These respective contentions were decided when this case was formerly before this court, and that decision now governs.

As above stated, the controlling question presented by this record is the value of plaintiff's time, services, and expenses in obtaining these loans. The uncontradicted testimony of plaintiff and witnesses Tucker and Mathison is sufficient to warrant a verdict in excess of that returned, taking into consideration the agreed item of interest paid. Even if the evidence of the other brokers on this question could be considered as improper, or confusing (although the jury was practically instructed to disregard it), and had been stricken out, we fail to perceive that a different verdict could have been rendered. Wherein will a new trial avail the defendant? It would only prolong the litigation and entail more costs. Taylor v. B. & O. Ry. Co., 33 W. Va. 39, 10 S. E. 29; Insurance Co. v. Trear, 29 Gratt. (Va.) 255.

We reverse the judgment of the circuit court which sets aside the verdict, reinstate the same, and render judgment thereon.

O'REAR v. STATE. (No. 2309.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Homicide \S 309(5)—Defendant not entitled to instruction as to manslaughter where evidence tended to show murder or justifiable homicide.

In a homicide case, where the evidence relied on by the state for a conviction tended to show that accused committed murder, and the statement of the accused and the evidence introduced in his behalf tended to sustain the defense of justifiable homicide, the law of voluntary manslaughter was not involved, and court did not err in failing to instruct the jury in regard thereto.

2. Criminal law \S 824(3)—Evidence held not to require charge on voluntary manslaughter without request.

In a homicide case, where defendant was convicted of murder, evidence held not to show that deceased and defendant mutually engaged in a mortal combat, so as to require the judge, without request, to give in charge to the jury the law of voluntary manslaughter as related to the doctrine of mutual combat.

3. Homicide \S 250—Evidence held to sustain conviction of murder.

In a homicide case, evidence held sufficient to sustain a verdict of murder.

Fish, C. J., and Atkinson, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Taliaferro County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Add O'Rear was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Neb Dunn, sworn for the state, testified:

When I walked up there Add was cursing, and he said, "If you don't like what I do why don't you do something?" Add kept cursing and calling him sons of bitches, and after a while he pulled his pistol out of his side breeches pocket and pulled his pistol out and cocked it that way (witness indicating). I spoke to him, I said, "Add, don't do that, you will get in trouble;" he said, "God damn you, I will attend to my own business." About that time, "bump," and when he shot the second time I run. Add was talking to Walter all the time, cursing him for sons of bitches and everything. * * * Add shot two times. Walter did not have nothing in his hands. Add said if Walter did not like, if Walter disliked what he did, why didn't he do something. I didn't hear Walter say anything out of the way to him. I ran; yes, sir; just as I turned to run, he made the second shot. I heard other shots after that. * * *

Clarke Pete, sworn for the state, testified:

When I got down there I heard them talking and went around there to see who it was, and Add was cursing Walter and Walter told him he didn't come there for no fuss and didn't want no fuss, and Add kept on cursing him and pulled out his pistol and shot, and I broke and run then. I didn't see anything in Walter's hand. I could see his hand. He was standing just this way, leaning, with his hand down side of him. He didn't make any movement with his hand. I was looking right at him. If he cursed Add I didn't hear him. Walter didn't look mad; he didn't seem to be mad. I was looking right at Add when he pulled his pistol. He cursed Walter for a God damn son of a bitch and pulled his pistol on him. He shot Walter with a pistol. I heard the firing after I left. I didn't see no more. After it was all over I come back there. When I come back Add had gone then. Walter was there at the buggy between the wheels, trying to get in the buggy and couldn't. They finally got Walter into the buggy. I do not know what become of him. After the first shot and I run the shooting began right on, one shot after another. I run and then one shot followed another.

John Alexander, sworn for the state, testified:

I did not see the shooting. I was there a piece from Felix's wagon shelter when the shooting took place. I was right at Walter Jarrell, right at the buggy shelter. I was there when he walked up. Add was there when Walter got there. Walter walked up and walked around that way, and I heard Add say, "Keep your God damn mouth out and run your business," and run his hand in here, and Walter walked around and slapped his foot on the buggy step. Add was on the right side of the buggy and Walter said, "I have not said a word to you," and he said, "I say, keep your God damn mouth out;" and I walked away and the shooting started, and I didn't look back any more. When I got about as far as that post there away the shooting had not started; then Walter didn't have a God Almighty's thing in his hand; he had his hand on his hip here this way. Walter did not make any movement to go into his pocket. If Walter was mad I couldn't tell it; he didn't look that way. Add commenced cursing him; yes, sir. I didn't see anybody with a pistol but Add. * * * There was more than one shot; yes, sir. I did not stop to count the shots. * * *

Horace Swain, sworn for the defendant, testified:

I was coming from out of the woods and come by the end of the shelter, and just as I got against the shelter they shot, and when I looked under the shelter they both shooting. I do not know who shot first. They shot about the time I got there. I looked under there and they were both shooting, Add and Walter. I kept on going.

Henry Young, sworn for the defendant, testified:

I went down there after the shooting. I did not see them put Walter in the buggy; he was already in the buggy when I got there. I saw some man, a stranger to me, trying to get his supporter from around his leg, and his leg was swollen so it had got tight. I told him to take his knife and cut it off, and I took my knife and cut it off, and when I cut it off this man reached in his pocket and got the pistol. He reached in Walter's pocket and got the pistol. I saw him get the pistol out of Walter's pocket and put it in his pocket.

Joe Holden, sworn for the defendant, testified:

I didn't notice when the first shot was fired; I wasn't paying no attention; I was right below there. * * * When the first shot fired I had my back turned, and then I turned and looked up toward the shelter, and it look like Add was fighting smoke or dust or something, with both of his hands. Then I saw him get his gun out of his pocket and he started to shooting. When I heard the first shot I looked up at the shelter. When the first shot fired I looked and saw Add fighting smoke out of his face. Then I saw Add come out from under the shelter and come out to the road and he met us. I did not see Walter do any shooting. I could see where he was after I looked around. After Add shot I moved.

Dyke Walker, sworn for the defendant, testified:

At the time Walter got shot I was sitting out in the buggy not far from there. I heard the noise; I wasn't paying them no attention until I heard the noise. I saw Walter with a pistol. I saw Walter shoot his pistol. Walter shot first; he shot before Add shot. When he made the first shot I saw Add fighting the smoke out of his face, and I got out of the buggy and went toward the shelter.

Arthur Ogletree, sworn for the defendant, testified:

I should think about eight or ten shots were fired. I couldn't tell exactly. One shot fired, and then in about 15 or 20 seconds and then the shooting began; it was so fast you couldn't count it. It came from more than one pistol; one pistol could not have shot that fast.

Defendant's statement was as follows:

I was down there at church and I wanted a drink of liquor and decided to go to the shelter, and I went up to the shelter and got around there—I got a drink from Clarke that morning and he told me if I wanted any more to go to the shelter where Neb was. Neb was standing under the shelter when I got around there, and I asked him did he have anything and he said not as much as a pint. "I may can spare you a drink," and he pulled the pint bottle from his pocket. Walter walked up and said, "Don't sell that damn son of a bitch a drink." I said, "Keep your mouth out of my business;" and he said, "Don't you like what I said?" And I said, "No; I don't;" and that time he come out with his pistol. Just as he threw it up I turned my head that way and the smoke was all in my eyes. I knocked the smoke out of my face, and when he made his next shot and when I got mine out I let in on him.

—Statement by editor.

Alvin G. Golucke and J. A. Beazley, both of Crawfordville, for plaintiff in error.

R. C. Norman, Sol. Gen., of Washington, Ga., R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., and Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

GILBERT, J. [1-3] The evidence relied on by the state for a conviction tends to show that the accused committed murder, whereas the statement of the accused and the evidence introduced in his behalf tend to sustain the defense of justifiable homicide. The law of voluntary manslaughter was not involved. McBeth v. State, 122 Ga. 737, 50 S. E. 931. The court did not err in failing to instruct the jury in regard thereto. No error is assigned upon any ruling during the trial, nor upon any charge or any other omission to charge the jury. The evidence authorized the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., and ATKINSON, J., dissenting, and GEORGE, J., absent.

FISH, C. J., and ATKINSON, J. There was evidence which would have warranted a finding that the defendant and the deceased, upon a sudden quarrel, each being armed with a deadly weapon, mutually engaged in a mortal combat, each using his weapon and intending to kill the other therewith. Under such circumstances it was the duty of the judge, without request, to give in charge to the jury the law of voluntary manslaughter as related to the doctrine of "mutual combat," and the omission to do so was cause for new trial; the accused having been convicted of murder. Waller v. State, 100 Ga. 320, 28 S. E. 77; Butt v. State, 150 Ga. 302, 103 S. E. 463.

DEAN v. STATE. (No. 2177.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Nuisance \S 77—Public nuisance will be enjoined at instance of state, though constituting a crime.

A court of equity will not enjoin the commission of crime generally; but it has jurisdiction, at will, in a proper case, at the instance of the state, restrain an existing or threatened public nuisance, though the offender is amenable to the criminal laws of the state.

2. Injunction \S 102—Nuisance \S 77—Criminality neither gives nor ousts jurisdiction; treatment of diseases by chiropractor not enjoined merely because contrary to penal statute.

That the act of which abatement by injunctive process is sought is made penal by statute neither gives nor ousts jurisdiction in chancery. Accordingly injunction will not lie at the instance of the state to restrain one from engaging in the practice of treating persons according to the chiropractic method merely because such person is amenable to the criminal laws of the state, in that he has not taken the prescribed examination and obtained a license from the state board of medical examiners, required of practitioners of medicine.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. Nuisance \S 72—One damaged by public nuisance has right of action.

Under Civ. Code 1910, § 4485, providing that any abuse of, or damage to, the personal property of another unlawfully is a trespass for which damages may be recovered, a private citizen caused special damage by a public nuisance has a right of action therefor.

4. Nuisance \S 59—"Public nuisance" defined.

A nuisance may be public, though it does not cause hurt, inconvenience, or injury to all of the public, if it injures those of the public who may come in contact with it.

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Suit by the State against C. L. Dean. Judgment granting an interlocutory injunction, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Upon the information of the commissioner of health of Colquitt county, the solicitor general of the Southern circuit, in the name of the state, brought an equitable action in the superior court of that county against Clay L. Dean. The petition alleges that the defendant is a chiropractor; that he visits the homes of the people in the community and county for the purpose of treating diseases, and maintains an office and place of business in the city of Moultrie, said county, where he treats diseases; that he lacks the necessary skill and training to combat the spread and growth of communicable diseases, and is maintaining a public nuisance in the practice of his profession, in that, without having obtained a license to practice medicine from the state board of medical examiners as required by statute, he engages in the practice of his profession in said county. The petition generally charges the defendant with misdeeds and with malpractice, to the injury of his patients and to the injury of the good morals and health of the public at large. The prayer is that he be restrained and enjoined from "treating any person or persons or prescribing or directing any method of treatment, or in any other manner violating the laws of said state regulating the practice of medicine." The defendant's answer admits that he is a chiropractor, as alleged in the petition; that he is engaged in the practice of his profession for compensation, and that he has not taken the prescribed examination and obtained a license from the state board of medical examiners, as required of practitioners of medicine. All other allegations of fact are expressly denied. He contends that he does not practice medicine; that he neither prescribes nor administers drugs or medicines in the treatment of disease; that he is not required, as a chiropractor, to take the examination and to obtain a license from the state board of medical examiners, as provided by the act approved August 18, 1913 (Acts 1913, p. 101), and the several acts amendatory thereof; and that, if any of the statutes of this state require him, as a chiropractor, to take the prescribed examination and to obtain a license from the state board of medical examiners, required of practitioners of medicine, such statutes are unconstitutional, for reasons stated. Upon the hearing for interlocutory injunction the chancellor passed an order enjoining the defendant as prayed. To this order the defendant excepted.

Shipp & Kline, of Moultrie, for plaintiff in error.

C. E. Hay, Sol. Gen., of Thomasville, Dowling & Askew, of Moultrie, and Johnson & Scott, of Atlanta, for the State.

GEORGE, J. (after stating the facts as above). The chancellor did not pass upon any issue of fact raised by the pleadings. He based his order enjoining the plaintiff in error from practicing his profession as a chiropractor expressly upon the ground that the act of the General Assembly approved August 18, 1913 (Acts 1913, p. 101), and the several acts amendatory thereof, were valid statutes of this state and applicable to the plaintiff in error, and that the practice of his profession by the plaintiff in error without having complied with the provisions of the statutes aforesaid constituted a violation of the criminal law of the state. Since the chancellor did not exercise his discretion upon the disputed issues of fact involved, the evidence introduced at the interlocutory hearing becomes unimportant.

[2] For the purposes of this case, and for the purposes of this case only, the validity of the statutes involved, as construed and applied by the chancellor, will be conceded. Section 6 of the act approved August 18, 1913 (Acts 1913, pp. 101, 103), declares that it shall be unlawful for any person to practice medicine in this state without having first taken the prescribed examination and obtained a license from the state board of medical examiners authorizing him so to do. Section 16 of the act declares that any person practicing medicine in this state without complying with the provisions of the act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished as prescribed in section 1065 of the Penal Code of 1910. Neither the act approved August 18, 1913, nor any of the acts amendatory thereof, declares one who engages in the practice of medicine in this state without having first taken the prescribed examination and obtained a license from the state board of medical examiners to be a public or common nuisance. None of the medical acts of this state undertake to extend the jurisdiction of equity over nuisances or to enlarge the category of public nuisances. The unlawful practice of medicine in this state is simply declared to be a misdemeanor. The question is, therefore, whether equity, at the instance of the state, will enjoin as a common nuisance one who is engaged in the practice of medicine (conceding that the plaintiff in error is engaged in the practice of medicine) who has not taken the prescribed examination and obtained a license from the state board of medical examiners authorizing him to engage in the practice of medicine in this state. The question may be stated as follows: Will equity, at the instance of the state, enjoin a person from practicing the profession of medicine simply because such person has failed to take the prescribed examination and to obtain a license from the state board of medical examiners authorizing him so to do, in violation of the penal laws of the state? To state the question is to answer it. The chancellor did not find that the practice of plaintiff in error's profession worked hurt, inconvenience, or damage to any particular person or to the public or to any particular part of the public. If the plaintiff in error had obtained the license required of practitioners of medicine, the same acts and conduct complained of in the petition, so far as determined by the chancellor, would have been legal and would have worked no hurt, inconvenience, or damage to any particular person, to the public at large, or to any part of the public. It is settled law that a private nuisance may injure either person or property or both, and in either case a right of action accrues to the person injured. Civil Code 1910, § 4456.

[3] It is also settled law that, if a public nuisance causes special damage to a private citizen, he has a right of action therefor. Civil Code 1910, § 4485; Holman v. Athens Empire Laundry Co., 149 Ga. 345, 349, 100 S. E. 207, 6 A. L. R. 1564, and cases there cited. It is also settled in this state that as a general rule a public nuisance gives no right of action to any individual, but must be abated by process instituted in the name of the State. Civil Code 1910, § 4454.

[1] If a criminal act affect the whole community, or a part of the community necessarily brought in contact therewith, the act may be abated by process in the name of the state as a public nuisance, although criminal. Walker v. McNelly, 121 Ga. 114, 48 S. E. 718. Where an act, though made penal by statute, is per se a public nuisance, it may generally be abated by injunction on petition brought in the name of the state. Brindle v. Copeland, 145 Ga. 398, 89 S. E. 332. While "equity has no jurisdiction, upon the petition of individuals, to interfere in matters merely criminal, or to enjoin any one from the commission of a crime, when it does not appear that the act complained of affected any property rights of the" individuals (O'Brien v. Harris, 105 Ga. 732, 31 S. E. 745), equity has jurisdiction, in a proper case, to enjoin a public nuisance upon information filed by the solicitor general. Under Civil Code 1910, § 4454:

"Nuisances are either public or private. A public nuisance is one which damages all persons who come within the sphere of its operation, though it may vary in its effects on individuals."

[4] It may also be said that a nuisance is either public or private or mixed. It may likewise be said that a public nuisance is one which causes hurt, inconvenience, or damage to the public generally, or such part of the public as necessarily come in contact with it. It is obvious that a nuisance may be public though it does not necessarily consist in any act or thing which does in fact cause hurt, inconvenience, or injury to all of the public; generally it is sufficient if it injures those of the public who may come in contact with it. These general principles may be subject to certain limitations, but it is unnecessary to notice the limitations here. Before the first medical act of Georgia (Ga. Laws 1880-81, p. 172) it was not illegal to practice medicine as such in Georgia without examination and without license. The treatment of diseases according to the chiropractic method cannot be classed as a common or public nuisance. It is not per se a nuisance. The chancellor has refused to find in this case (even if it be conceded that he was authorized so to find) that the treatment of persons according to the chiropractic method, as practiced by plaintiff in error, was harmful to his patients, or to any part of the public, or to the public generally as noted above. The mere fact that the plaintiff in error in practicing his profession without a license may be guilty of a misdemeanor will not authorize a court of equity to enjoin him from practicing his profession. If the medical acts of this state are applicable to the plaintiff in error, he is amenable to criminal prosecution. Unless the Legislature sees fit to extend the jurisdiction of equity or to enlarge the category of public nuisances (conceding the power of the Legislature so to do), equity will not enjoin the plaintiff in error from practicing his profession simply because in so doing he is violating the penal laws of the state (conceding the validity of the medical acts, as construed and applied by the chancellor).

HOLY TRINITY GREEK ORTHODOX CHURCH OF AUGUSTA v. BRANSFORD.
(No. 2143.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Remainders — Beneficiary of life interest in realty and sole heir of grantor held entitled to specific performance of contract to purchase, where her children, the remaindermen, were all dead.

Beneficiary of trust in land for and during her natural life, and after her death in further trust for the use and benefit of any child or children living at her death during their minority, to go to such child or children when they reached majority, or, if they died prior thereto, remainder to go to the estate of the grantor, who was the father of the said beneficiary, was entitled to specific performance of a contract to purchase the land, entered into after the death of the grantor, his wife and all the children of the beneficiary prior to reaching their majority, parents dying intestate and beneficiary being the sole heir and having been substituted as trustee, where defendant agreed to be satisfied with deed tendered, if it should pass a good and marketable title, except for the legal possibility of additional issue.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. Lizzie Baker Bransford against the Holy Trinity Greek Orthodox Church of Augusta. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The defendant entered into a contract with plaintiff to purchase land, the petition, among other things, alleging the making of the contract sued on and that—

(3) In said contract of sale your petitioner obligated herself to furnish to said defendant a good and marketable title to said property, and to execute and deliver a good and sufficient deed, with warranty of title, to the party of the second part; a copy of said agreement, without the plat, being hereunto attached, marked Exhibit A, to which the usual reference is prayed.

(4) That in compliance with said agreement your petitioner on the 18th day of February, 1920, duly executed a warranty deed to the said defendant covering said tract of land described in said agreement, and tendered the same to said defendant for acceptance, and requested or demanded the payment of the purchase price, to wit, $7,500, for said tract of land; a copy of said deed so executed and tendered by your petitioner being hereunto attached, marked Exhibit B, to which the usual reference is prayed.

(5) That upon the tender of said deed by your petitioner to defendant the defendant declined and refused to accept the same, giving as a reason therefor that said property was held by your petitioner under the terms and conditions of a trust set forth in the deed from Alfred Baker, your petitioner's father, to the said Alfred Baker, as trustee for your petitioner (your petitioner being named in said deed as Lizzie F. Bransford), dated the 25th day of May, 1888; a copy of said deed being hereunto attached, marked Exhibit C, to which the usual leave of reference is prayed as often as may be necessary. * * *

(7) Your petitioner further shows that under the terms of said trust deed said land was conveyed to said Alfred Baker, as trustee, in trust for the sole and separate use, benefit, and behoof of Lizzie F. Bransford, your petitioner, daughter of said Alfred Baker, for and during her natural life, free from the debts, contracts, liabilities, or control of any husband, and after her death in further trust for the use and benefit of any child or children living at her death, during their minority. If she die leaving no children at her death, or if they all die during their minority, then this trust to cease, and the property hereby conveyed, and all additions thereto by gift, grant, devise, purchase, accumulation, or otherwise, and all the trust property, shall go by reversion or remainder to grantor hereof, the said Alfred Baker. But if she leave child or children and any of her children attain majority, and provided they attain majority, then and in such case, in further trust, to hold said property and all additions thereto until they attain majority, and as each child attains such age to convey said property in fee simple, share and share alike, to such child or children so attaining majority.

(8) Your petitioner further alleges that at the time said trust deed was executed she was married to Dr. John F. Bransford, and thereafter there was born to them two children only, to wit, Alfred Baker Bransford and Henry W. Bransford, each of whom died before attaining their legal majority, to wit, on August 24, 1911, and shortly after the death of her said two children her husband, Dr. John F. Bransford, departed this life, and your petitioner is now a widow, without children, and is over 60 years of age, unmarried, and has attained the age where the possibility of issue is extinct.

(9) That Alfred Baker, your petitioner's father, departed this life intestate on the 16th day of June, 1896, owing no debts and leaving as his sole heirs at law his widow (your petitioner's mother), Sarah Elizabeth Thayer Baker, and your petitioner, who was his daughter and only child, and there is no administration on his estate.

(10) That your petitioner's mother, the said Sarah Elizabeth Thayer Baker, died intestate on May 16, 1899, owing no debts and leaving as her sole and only heir at law your petitioner, her only child and daughter, and there is no administration on her estate.

(11) That on the 16th day of January, 1897, following the death of your petitioner's father, Alfred Baker, trustee under said deed, your petitioner was duly and legally appointed substituted trustee in lieu of said Alfred Baker, in appropriate proceedings by the judge of the superior court of said Richmond county, and duly qualified by giving bond as required in said trust deed, and continued to act as said trustee until after the death of her said two children in August, 1911. * * *

(17) That as your petitioner has no other children there are no other remaindermen under said deed other than the estate of said Alfred Baker, which, as hereinbefore stated, now belongs to your petitioner as the sole heir at law of the said Alfred Baker and his said wife, petitioner's mother, Sarah Elizabeth Thayer Baker.

(18) That as your petitioner is a widow, unmarried, over 60 years of age, and having reached that age where the possibility of issue is extinct, she owns the entire fee-simple interest in all of the property conveyed under said trust deed, or belonging to said trust estate.

(19) That your petitioner as such owner of said property has the unqualified right, individually, to sell and convey said property by a warranty deed, and to receive and collect the purchase price therefor.

(20) That your petitioner, having duly executed a warranty deed in compliance with the terms of said contract or agreement of sale, and duly tendered the same to said defendant, is entitled to specific performance of said contract, and said defendant should be required to accept said deed and pay the purchase price set forth in said agreement, to wit, $7,500.

Defendant answering paragraph 18 of petition, "denies the legal conclusions therein stated, and says that the interest of Alfred Baker as a contingent reversioner or remainderman under the trust deed will pass to the heirs at law of Alfred Baker, to be determined at the death of Mrs. Bransford."

The agreed statement of facts was as follows:

The parties to the above-stated cause agree that all questions of law and of fact be, and they are hereby, submitted to the judge of the superior court of the Augusta circuit to determine without the intervention of a jury.

In addition to the facts alleged in the petition and admitted in the answer to be true, the following facts are agreed:

On December 17, 1919, the plaintiff, Mrs. Bransford, and the defendant, the Holy Trinity Greek Orthodox Church, entered into the agreement set out in the petition. The plaintiff duly tendered the deed in accordance with the terms of the contract, and demanded payment therefor. The deed was declined for the reasons alleged in paragraph 5 of the petition.

All of the property covered by the deed tendered by the plaintiff is embraced in the trust estate represented originally by Alfred Baker, except, perhaps, a small fraction thereof, which belongs to the plaintiff individually, but it is admitted that the deed offered by the plaintiff carries with it this small fraction if it legally carries the portion which is owned by the trust estate.

It is admitted that if Mrs. Lizzie B. Bransford, the plaintiff, owns the estate in reversion, by inheritance from her father, as well as the life estate under the trust deed, that she has a good, marketable title to said property, and the deed tendered by her would pass a good and sufficient title to the defendant.

When the trust deed was executed, the plaintiff was married to Dr. Bransford, and thereafter there was born two children to the plaintiff, both of whom died August 24, 1911, during their minority. Shortly thereafter Dr. Bransford died, and the plaintiff is now a widow, without children, and is over 60 years of age. The possibility of issue is, so far as this case is concerned, extinct. If the deed tendered by the plaintiff passes a good and marketable title except for the legal possibility of additional issue of the plaintiff, the defendant is satisfied therewith.

Alfred Baker, the father of the plaintiff, died intestate June 16, 1896, leaving as his sole heirs at law his wife, Mrs. Sarah F. Baker, and the plaintiff, his daughter; and all of his debts have been paid. The said Sarah E. Baker died intestate May 16, 1899, leaving as her sole heir at law the plaintiff, and all of her debts have been paid.

Mrs. Bransford was, after the death of Alfred Baker, appointed trustee in his place, by appropriate proceedings in the superior court of Richmond county.

The construction of the trust deed, and the interest of the plaintiff thereunder, is to be determined in the light of the facts herein agreed to, with the additional facts alleged in the petition and admitted by the defendant, but not the conclusions of law, which the defendant denies in its answer.

AMMONS v. STATE. (No. 12217.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
April 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Homicide \S 82—Defendant liable, though fatal shot fired by another if there was a conspiracy.

If a conspiracy existed between defendant, convicted of manslaughter, and another to take the life of deceased, and both shot at deceased about the same time, it was not essential to a conviction that defendant's shot should have been the fatal one.

2. Homicide \S 340(4)—Erroneous charge on murder is harmless when verdict is for manslaughter.

An erroneous charge on the subject of murder does not require a new trial in a case where the verdict was for manslaughter.

3. Homicide \S 281—Submission of question of conspiracy held proper.

Where there was some evidence of a conspiracy between defendant and another to kill deceased, it was not error to submit the question of conspiracy to the jury, accompanied by appropriate instructions.

Error from Superior Court, Rockdale County; John B. Hutcheson, Judge.

Americus Ammons was convicted of manslaughter, and he brings error. Affirmed.

J. H. McCalla and C. R. Vaughn, both of Conyers, and King & Johnson, of Covington, for plaintiff in error.

A. M. Brand, Sol. Gen., of Lithonia, for the State.

BROYLES, O. J. [1] 1. The defendant was charged with murder, and upon the trial there was some evidence which would have authorized the jury to find that a conspiracy existed between the defendant and his half-brother to take the life of the deceased, and that both of them shot at the deceased about the same time, and that one of them killed him. In view of these facts, it was not error for the court to refuse to charge:

"In order to convict the defendant of the offense of murder or voluntary manslaughter, it is necessary that you believe beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant now on trial fired the shot that took away the life of the deceased.

And, unless the evidence so convinces you, you would not be authorized to convict the defendant either of murder or voluntary manslaughter. In other words, unless you believe beyond a reasonable doubt that it was the bullet from the defendant's pistol that killed the deceased, you would not be authorized to find the defendant guilty of either murder or manslaughter, and in this view you would not be required to grade this homicide."

[2] 2. Under repeated rulings of the Supreme Court and of this court, an erroneous charge upon the subject of murder does not require a new trial in a case where the verdict was for manslaughter. Under this ruling, ground 5 of the motion for a new trial is without merit.

[3] 3. Under the evidence it was not error for the court to submit to the jury the question whether or not a conspiracy had been shown, and to accompany the submission of this question with appropriate instructions thereon.

4. The verdict was amply authorized by the evidence, and it was not error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
April 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Criminal law \S 1015—Errors in two proceedings for similar offenses not reviewable on one bill of exceptions.

Where a defendant is charged in two accusations with the offense of simple larceny, pleads guilty to both charges, and is sentenced to the chain gang for each offense, he cannot in one bill of exceptions bring to this court for review the question of whether or not the trial judge erred in overruling his single motion to withdraw his two pleas of guilty. There being no provision of law for such procedure, this court is without jurisdiction to entertain such a bill of exceptions. See Futch v. Mathis, 148 Ga. 558, 97 S. E. 516, and cases there cited.

Certiorari \Leftrightarrow 70(8)—For insufficiency of evidence, if finding affirmed by superior court is supported by evidence, there is nothing for review.

Where a petition for the writ of certiorari is based solely on the allegation that the finding of the trial court was unsupported by any evidence, and the finding is sustained on review by the judge of the superior court and the certiorari overruled, no question for decision by this court is presented, if there is some evidence to support the finding of the trial court.

[1, 2] 2. Some of the special grounds of the motion for a new trial failed to conform to the rule laid down by the Supreme Court, that—

"This court cannot review an instruction alleged to be erroneous, when the exception thereto does not set forth, literally or in substance, the language complained of, so as to convey a clear understanding of such instruction." Williams v. State, 145 Ga. 177, 88 S. E. 958.

See, also, Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Phillips, 117 Ga. 98 (2), 43 S. E. 494; Smith v. Owen, 112 Ga. 531 (1), 37 S. E. 729; St. John

v. Leyden, 111 Ga. 152 (4), 36 S. E. 610; Southern Railway Co. v. Dantzler, 99 Ga. 323 (2), 25 S. E. 606. Other of the special grounds are not referred to in the brief of plaintiff in error, and must be treated as abandoned. Crawford v. State, 149 Ga. 485 (4), 100 S. E. 633; Starling v. State, 24 Ga. App. 422 (3), 100 S. E. 771. In the condition in which we find the record and the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error, we cannot say that the trial judge erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

1. Bridges §44(4) — Traveler may recover for injuries though knowing of defects.

A traveler on a public highway exercising due care may recover for injuries sustained in driving over a defective bridge, though he knows there is some danger, unless the danger is obviously of such a character that driving over the bridge in itself amounts to a want of ordinary care.

2. Appeal and error §1033(9) — Defendant cannot complain that verdict is too small.

Defendant cannot complain that the amount of the verdict was less than the proven damages.

"A traveler on the public highway, exercising due care, although he knows there is some danger in driving over a defective bridge, may recover for injuries thus sustained, unless the danger is obviously of such a character that driving over the bridge, in and of itself, amounts to a 'want of ordinary care.'" Elbert County v. Threkeld, 145 Ga. 133, 88 S. E. 683. The charge of the court, having followed this language of the Supreme Court, and being otherwise qualified and enlarged by a correct statement of the law relative to the burden of proof, the respective duties of the plaintiff and the county to exercise ordinary care, and the burden on the plaintiff to show actual or constructive notice to the county of the defect in the bridge, is not subject to the exceptions taken.

EASON v. STATE. (No. 12202.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
April 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Homicide §316 — Failure to charge on involuntary manslaughter held not ground for new trial, in absence of request.

Under the facts of the case, the failure of the court to instruct the jury upon the law of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of a lawful act without due caution and circumspection was not, in the absence of a request for such an instruction, cause for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Tattnall County; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

Bill Eason was convicted of involuntary manslaughter, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Way & McCall, of Reidsville, for plaintiff in error.

J. Saxton Daniel, Sol. Gen., of Claxton, for the State.

BROYLES, C. J. The defendant was charged with murder, and convicted of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act. The evidence authorized a finding that the defendant was unlawfully pointing a rifle at the deceased, when it accidentally fired, killing the deceased. The defendant's sole defense was that the killing was accidental, and in his statement he said he did not know the gun was loaded, and that it went off accidentally, but he did not specifically deny that he had the gun pointed at the deceased when it fired. On the contrary, he admitted that a few minutes previous to the shooting he had "thrown" the gun towards the deceased, but that, if he had known it was loaded, he would not have been "pranking" with it. Furthermore, no witness in the case specifically testified that the defendant was not pointing the gun at the deceased when it fired. The court fully and clearly instructed the jury upon the law of accident. Under these facts, the failure to charge upon the law of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of a lawful act without due caution and circumspection does not, in the absence of a request for such an instruction, require another trial of the case.

The verdict was amply authorized by the evidence, and it was not error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

BRAY v. STATE. (No. 12113.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
April 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law \S 453, 1064(4)—Testimony that man in automobile containing liquor was defendant in opinion of witness held competent; ground of motion for new trial not complete when brief of evidence must be examined.

The amendment to the motion for a new trial was without merit.

2. Intoxicating liquors \S 236(4)—Evidence sufficient to support conviction for possessing liquors.

The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from City Court of Hall County;
A. C. Wheeler, Judge.

G. E. Bray was convicted of having possession of intoxicating liquors, and he brings error. Affirmed.

W. J. Phillips and B. P. Gaillard, Jr., both of Gainesville, for plaintiff in error.

E. D. Kenyon, Sol., of Gainesville, for the State.

BROYLES, C. J. [1] 1. The motion for a new trial complains that, over the objection of the defendant, the court admitted the following material evidence of a witness:

"As to who was in the car I couldn't say, my opinion it was Mr. Bray, or some one similar to him, looked like him that night. In the best of my opinion he was the man."

We think this evidence was admissible for what it was worth. Furthermore, the ground is not complete within itself, since it would require an examination of the brief of evidence for this court to ascertain whether the evidence was material.

[2] 2. The defendant was charged with having in his possession intoxicating liquors. The evidence showed that on the night of March 17, 1920, in Hall county, an automobile containing 50 gallons of whisky was captured by two officers. Two men were in the automobile, and were seen by the officers, but these men escaped. The defendant was accused of being one of these men, but denied the charge and attempted to prove an alibi. He stated that on the night of March 17, 1920, he was in Augusta with a friend named J. C. Mitchell. J. C. Mitchell testified to the same effect. There was other testimony tending to support this alibi. It was proved that the defendant was engaged in the taxicab business in Athens, Ga., and that he had four automobiles, one of which was the "whisky" car captured by the officers. The defendant introduced evidence tending to show that this car was stolen from his garage while he was in Augusta with Mitchell. One of the arresting officers testified as follows:

"As to who was in the car (the "whisky" car in question) I couldn't say, my opinion it was Mr. Bray, or some one similar to him, looked like him that night. In the best of my opinion he was the man."

The other officer testified that he could not swear that the defendant was one of the men in the car, but this witness did swear positively and unequivocally that he did recognize the defendant's witness, J. C. Mitchell, as one of the two men who were in the car on the night it was captured. The jury had the right to believe this witness' testimony in preference to all of the other testimony in the case, and if they believed his testimony was true (J. C. Mitchell having sworn that he and the defendant were together in Augusta on the night of March 17, 1920, and the defendant having stated the same thing), then they were authorized to reject that part of Mitchell's testimony, and that part of the defendant's statement, as to their being in Augusta on that night, and to find that they were together in the "whisky" car in Hall county on that date. It follows that the defendant's conviction was authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

1. New trial ⇨35—Admission of irrelevant evidence no ground.

The admission of irrelevant and immaterial evidence held not ground for a new trial.

2. Trial ⇨35—General objection to evidence admissible in part insufficient.

Where evidence is offered and objected to, and a portion thereof is admissible and a part objectionable, unless the illegal portion is specified and properly objected to, the whole will be admitted.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1078(6)—Grounds for new trial waived by failure to argue.

Special grounds of motion for new trial, not argued in the brief of plaintiff in error, will be treated as having been abandoned.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1005(2)—Approved verdict supported by evidence not disturbed.

Where there was some evidence to support the verdict, which has the approval of the trial judge, the appellate court will not interfere.

Boykin & Boykin, of Carrollton, for plaintiff in error.

Emmett Smith, of Carrollton, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1] 1. If the court erred in the admission of certain irrelevant and immaterial evidence, as complained of in the first and second grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, this evidence was not of such materiality as to require the grant of a new trial. See Arnold v. Stevens, 139 Ga. 495, 77 S. E. 579; Ga., Fla. & Ala. Ry. Co. v. Parsons, 12 Ga. App. 180 (6), 76 S. E. 1063.

[2] 2. "Where evidence is offered and objected to, and a portion thereof is admissible and a part objectionable, unless the illegal portion is specified and properly objected to, the whole will be admitted." City of Atlanta v. Sciple, 19 Ga. App. 694 (3), 698, 92 S. E. 28, and cases cited. See, also, Thacher v. Carolina Cement Co., 21 Ga. App. 569 (1), 94 S. E. 838, and cases cited; Eckman v. State, 23 Ga. [3] 3. Grounds 4 and 5 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, not being argued in the brief of plaintiff in error, will be treated as having been abandoned.

[4] There was some evidence to support the verdict, which has the approval of the trial judge, and this court will not interfere. Judgment affirmed.

MAPP v. STATE. (No. 11984.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 9, 1921.)(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Criminal law ⇨1064(4)—Ground of motion for new trial, not showing objection overruled, is insufficient.

A ground of a motion for new trial, complaining of the overruling of an objection to a question asked a witness, presents nothing for consideration, where it does not state what the objection was.

2. Criminal law ⇨1064(4, 6)—Ground of motion for new trial, not showing objection to conduct of court and admission of evidence held insufficient.

A ground of a motion for a new trial, complaining that the court directed the solicitor general to ask a witness a question and admitted the answer, presents nothing for review where it fails to show any objection.

3. Witnesses ⇨367(1)—Cross-examination as to whether a witness was paid his expenses, held properly excluded.

On a trial for manufacturing intoxicating liquors, the exclusion, as immaterial, of a question, asked the sheriff on cross-examination, as to whether he got certain expenses back out of insolvent costs and other things, held not error.

4. Witnesses ⇨371—Rulings as to extent to which defendant could show motive for witness' implication of defendant's witness held not error.

Where a witness for the state had also implicated O., a witness for defendant, and defendant sought to show motive by the testimony of O. that the state's witness broke his contract to work for O. by running away, and that O. sent after him and had him brought back, the court's ruling that defendant could show he had a contract and went away, but not the particulars of the contract, held not error.

5. Witnesses ⇨363(1)—Cross-examination of defendant's witness, implicated by witness for state, held proper.

Questions asked a witness for defendant, who had been implicated in the offense by a witness for the state, on cross-examination, as to how many times he was before the grand jury, whether a third party brought him and others, and took considerable interest in the case, and why he objected "to turning this boy loose," held properly permitted.

6. Criminal law \S 1064(4)—Motion for new trial, not naming witness giving objectionable testimony, not considered.

A ground of a motion for new trial, complaining of the admission of specified testimony, but not stating the name of the witness, cannot be considered on appeal.

7. Criminal law \S 789(2)—Instruction defining "reasonable doubt" held not erroneous.

An instruction that there was a presumption of defendant's innocence, which remained until removed by proof sufficient to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt, defining a "reasonable doubt" as one growing out of the evidence, either the want of sufficient evidence or the conflicts in evidence, and leaving the mind of the jury, seeking the truth, wavering and unsettled, and unable to come to a conclusion as to the truth, and that when the jury had such a doubt they should acquit, was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Reasonable Doubt.]

8. Criminal law \S 922(2)—Failure to charge that jury are judges of law and facts not ground for new trial.

The failure to charge in a criminal case that the jury are the judges of the law and the facts is not ground for reversal of a judgment refusing a new trial.

9. Intoxicating liquors \S 167—One aiding in manufacturing liquors held guilty.

On a trial for manufacturing liquors, an instruction that one aiding in the manufacture of liquor, whether he owned the still or not, was as guilty as if he owned the still and did the work himself, held not to require a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; F. A. Irwin, Judge.

Ernest Mapp was convicted of manufacturing liquor, and he brings error. Affirmed.

The second ground of the amended motion for a new trial complained of the exclusion of a question asked the sheriff as to whether he got certain expenses back out of the insolvent costs and other things, on the ground that it was immaterial and had nothing to do with the case.

Jake Heflin was a witness against defendant, and also implicated one Odom. The third ground complained of the exclusion of questions asked Odom for the purpose of showing that Heflin's motive for implicating him was that he had broken his contract to work for Odom by running away, and that Odom had sent after him and had him brought back. The court's ruling was that—"I will let you show that he had a contract and went away, but the particulars of the contract cannot be proved."

The fourth ground complained of the admission of questions asked Odom on cross-examination as to the number of times he was before the grand jury, whether one Lumsden brought him and others every time, and if Lumsden did not take considerable interest in the case, and—

"What did you demand of the sheriff, that you objected to turning this boy loose?"

—Statement by editor.

James & Bedgood, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

J. R. Hutcheson, Sol. Gen., of Douglasville, for the State.

BROYLES, C. J. [1, 2] 1. The first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial alleges that the court erred in not sustaining the objection of counsel for the defendant to a certain question propounded to a witness and to the answer thereto, but it is not stated in the ground what the objection was. In the same ground complaint is made that the court, on its own motion, directed the solicitor general to ask the witness a certain question, and error is assigned upon this direction of the court, and upon the admission of the answer of the witness; but the ground fails to show that any objection was made during the trial to the direction of the court or to the admission of the answer of the witness. It follows that the ground presents no question for the consideration of this court.

[3-5] 2. The rulings upon the admissibility of evidence, as set forth in the second, third, and fourth grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, were not erroneous for any reason assigned.

[6] 3. The fifth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial cannot be considered, since it complains of the admission of specified testimony of a witness, but fails to state the name of the witness. Adams v. State, 22 Ga. App. 252 (1), 95 S. E. 877, and cases cited.

[7] 4. There was no error in the following excerpt from the charge of the court:

"The defendant comes before you with the presumption of innocence in his favor; that presumption should remain with him until it is removed by proof—by proof sufficient to satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt. A reasonable doubt is a doubt that grows out of the evidence, either the want of sufficient evidence to satisfy you or the conflicts in the evidence. It is a doubt that leaves the mind of the jury, seeking the truth, wavering and unsettled—not satisfied from the evidence, unable to come to a conclusion as to what the truth is, and when you have such a doubt as that, you should give it to the defendant and acquit him."

[8] 5. The failure of the judge to charge the jury that in a criminal case they are the judges of the law and the facts is not ground for a reversal of the judgment refusing a new trial. Jones v. State, 136 Ga. 157, 71 S. E. 6; Brown v. State, 151 Ga. —, 105 S. E. 289.

[9] 6. Under the facts of the case, a new trial is not required because of the following excerpt from the charge of the court:

"I charge you that, if a man aids in the manufacture of liquor in any way, whether he owns the still or not, if he aids in manufacturing liquor, he is as guilty as if he owned the still and did the work himself."

7. The verdict was amply authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

TERRY SHIPBUILDING CORPORATION v. GREGORY. (No. 11914.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1002 — Verdict based on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

A verdict based on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal where sufficient to sustain the verdict.

2. Appeal and error \S 302(3)—Complaint of admission of evidence not considered in absence of evidence in ground for new trial.

A ground of motion for a new trial complaining of the admission of certain documentary evidence cannot be considered where the evidence is not set forth in the ground or attached to it as an exhibit.

3. New trial \S 35—Refusal to permit witness to testify not ground when no sufficient offer made.

Refusal to permit a witness to testify as to a certain matter is not cause for a new trial where it is not shown what he would have testified or was expected to testify as to the matter if he had been allowed to do so, nor unless it appears that the party complaining of such refusal offered the testimony or asked that it be admitted, nor unless the court was informed of what it was proposed to prove by the witness, and it should appear that such testimony was material and would have benefited the complaining party.

4. Appeal and error \S 1033(1)—No complaint of favorable ruling.

Party cannot complain on appeal of a ruling in his favor.

5. Trial \S 29(2)—Statement of court held not to amount to an expression of opinion.

Statement of court in presence of jury when admitting a letter: "I will admit this letter. It appears that it required an answer and contains a statement which, if found true, the defendant had an opportunity to deny"—held not to amount to an expression or intimation of an opinion as to what had been proved in the case.

6. Trial \S 255(13)—Not necessary to explain to jury meaning of preponderance of evidence in absence of request.

In the absence of an appropriate request, it is not error to fail to explain to the jury the meaning of "the preponderance of the evidence."

7. Trial \S 233(1) — Charge held to set out contentions of defendant in plea excusing discharge of plaintiff as servant.

In an action by a servant for salary after an alleged wrongful discharge, where defendant contended that contract of employment terminated at time of alleged wrongful discharge, and that plaintiff had done no work after that date and was due no pay, and that the discharge was justified in that he had been employed upon representations that he was perfectly competent, and he proved to be incompetent, opinionated, egotistical, and incapable of working harmoniously with those around him, held, that charge of court substantially set out the contentions of defendant as contained in its plea.

8. Trial \S 248 — Charge held to apply to facts.

In an action by servant alleging that he was wrongfully discharged before the expiration of his contract of employment, charge held not subject to the criticism that it failed to apply the law to the particular facts in the case.

9. Master and servant \S 44 — Charge on breach of contract held not objectionable.

In an action by servant for wrongful discharge, the charge, viewing it as a whole, held not objectionable in the absence of a specific request to that effect for failing to charge more fully what constituted a breach of the contract.

10. Master and servant \S 44—Charge on issue of wrongful discharge held full and fair.

In an action for wrongful discharge before the expiration of contract of employment, where defendant contended that plaintiff had falsely represented that he was competent, when in fact he was incompetent and could not work in harmony with those about him, charge of court held full and fair.

11. Master and servant \S 44 — Instruction on condonation of breach of contract held applicable to issues.

In an action for wrongful discharge, an instruction as to waiver of breach of contract by the servant and presumption as to condonation held applicable to the issues and pleadings, defendant claiming that it rightfully discharged plaintiff by reason of his incompetency and inability to work harmoniously with others.

12. Trial \S 193(2), 240 — Instruction as to waiver of breach of contract of employment held not argumentative or expressive of opinion of court.

In action by employee against master who, he alleged, had wrongfully discharged him, an instruction as to condonation and waiver of breach of contract of employment by employee held not argumentative or calculated to impress the jury with the idea that the court favored the plaintiff rather than the defendant.

13. Master and servant — Charge on damages for discharge held proper.

A charge that, if, because of the fact it suited the convenience of the defendant to change its business, or if for any reason not growing out of the fault of the plaintiff it saw fit to discharge him, the jury would be authorized to find that there was a breach of the contract of hiring, and then would determine what damages, if any, the plaintiff has sustained, held proper as against contentions that it contained an intimation that defendant had changed its business and discharged the plaintiff for that reason; there being no pleadings or evidence on which to properly predicate such a charge; and that the court did not point out any rule of damages, and did not point out that defendant would be entitled to a credit for whatever plaintiff earned in other employment.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Action by C. H. Gregory against the Terry Shipbuilding Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Some of the grounds of the motion for new trial were as follows:

(12) Because the court erred in admitting in evidence the letter of April 8, 1919, from the plaintiff, C. H. Gregory, to Mr. J. J. Seknicka, superintendent planning and progress department, over the objections of defendant that the same was a self-serving declaration and because the court in admitting the letter in evidence stated in the presence of the jury: "I will admit this letter. It appears that it required an answer and contains a statement which, if found true, the defendant had an opportunity to deny"—the expressions from the bench constituting an expression of opinion favorable to the plaintiff's side of the issue and was confusing and misleading to the jury, in that said ruling imposed upon the defendant an obligation of answering a letter which called for no reply, especially as the plaintiff in said letter construed his alleged discharge by Mr. Seknicka as not having any other meaning than an expression of Mr. Seknicka's desire and intention to have the plaintiff transferred to another department of the Terry Shipbuilding Corporation, the court having already declined to permit the defendant's general superintendent, George Baxter, to testify as to what took place between him and Mr. Waugh, superintendent of ship construction, and between him and Mr. Russ, the defendant's vice president and treasurer, with reference to the placing of plaintiff in another department of the Terry Shipbuilding Corporation.

(13) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "In order to justify a master in discharging the servant, the servant must have been guilty of conduct that amounts to a breach of some expressed or implied provision of the contract of hiring. Anything less than that will not amount to a legal justification or excuse"—without anywhere in the charge pointing out to the jury what would have constituted such a breach of contract in the light of the contentions made in defendant's plea.

(14) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "The question as to whether the master has waived a breach of contract by the servant by retaining him in service after knowledge of such breach is a question of fact for the jury. Prima facie it is a waiver and a condonation is presumed; but, if there are circumstances shown that tend to establish a reasonable or proper excuse for delay, it is for the jury to say whether in fact the breach was condoned. If, however, such breach has in fact been condoned, it cannot subsequently be relied on by the master to discharge the servant from the master's service"—the errors being: * * *

(b) It was inapplicable to the issues in the case and not warranted by the pleadings or the evidence.

(c) It was argumentative and calculated to impress the jury with the idea that the court favored the plaintiff rather than the defendant.

(15) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "But if you find that the plaintiff entered the service of this defendant company under a contract, and if because of the fact it suited the convenience of the company to change its business, or if for any other reason not growing out of the fault of the plaintiff it saw fit to discharge the plaintiff from its service, you would be authorized to find that there was a breach of the contract of hiring, and then you would determine what damages, if any, the plaintiff has sustained by reason of the breach of that contract, and you would be authorized to find a verdict for that amount"—the errors being:

(a) That the instruction quoted contained an intimation to the jury that the defendant company had changed its business and discharged the plaintiff from its service for that reason, there being no pleadings or evidence on which to properly predicate such a charge.

(b) The court did not in said instruction, nor elsewhere in the charge, point out to the jury any rule or measure by which to determine what damages, if any, the plaintiff sustained by reason of his discharge.

(c) The court did not in said instruction, nor elsewhere in the charge, point out to the jury on the question of damages that the defendant would be entitled to a credit or offset against plaintiff's damages for whatever amount the plaintiff earned in other employment or might by proper application and due diligence have earned in other employment during the period of time from April 15 to May 1, 1919, which was the period of time involved in the suit.

The charge of the court was as follows:

The plaintiff brings his action against the defendant for $100. The defendant denies that it owes the plaintiff $100 or any part thereof. The defendant says that the plaintiff performed no service for it between April 15th and May 1st, and that the defendant is not indebted to the plaintiff for any salary for that period of time. The defendant, for further plea, says that, effective April 15, 1919, the service of the plaintiff with the defendant was discontinued by the defendant, due notice thereof and all the notice that the plaintiff was entitled to being given to the plaintiff by the defendant. The defendant insists that, "irrespective of any question as to the term for which plaintiff may have been employed, the dismissal of the plaintiff by the defendant from its employment was justified by law. The defendant avers that the plaintiff had been employed by the defendant to work in its shipyard at Port Wentworth and represented himself, or caused himself to be represented, to this defendant as well-trained, experienced, and skillful and in all respects competent and qualified to perform the duties to which he was assigned. Defendant found him to be incompetent, unskillful, and unsatisfactory. He was first assigned to the purchasing department, and was employed in that department for two or three months. He was frequently in trouble with the officers in the purchasing department, as well as with the storekeeper, and on one occasion engaged in a fist fight with the storekeeper. He was contentious, opinionated, egotistical, and seemingly incapable of working harmoniously with those around him. Thinking he might perhaps be a useful employee in some other department, defendant placed him in the planning and progress department. He manifested the same characteristics in this department that had made him so objectionable in the purchasing department. He had considerable trouble with Mr. Thompson, who was the head official of the planning and progress department, and the situation became so disagreeable to Mr. Thompson that he resigned. Mr. Seknicka was then placed at the head of the planning and progress department, and his experience with the plaintiff was no more satisfactory than Mr. Thompson's experience had been. The plaintiff continued to be so egotistical, opinionated, disrespectful to those in authority over him, discourteous to his fellow servants, and altogether such a source of discord, dissension, and dissatisfaction among the other employees that defendant was compelled to relieve him of further duties and discontinue his employment. Any further retention of the plaintiff by defendant in defendant's service would have been distinctly injurious to the defendant's business and interests, and as a measure of self-protection the defendant was compelled to dismiss the plaintiff from its employment."

That plea makes the issue you are to pass upon. This is an appeal case. It is none of your business what the judgment in the court below was, and if in the progress of this case you should find out which way that judgment was rendered you must not be governed thereby. But you must take the law from the court and the facts from the witness stand, apply the one to the other, and render a verdict in accordance with the dictates of your own consciences.

The plaintiff contends that he entered the service of this defendant company, and was wrongfully discharged. The burden is on the plaintiff to prove his contract of service as he represents it. The further burden is upon him to show to your satisfaction and by the preponderance of the evidence that he was wrongfully discharged from the service of this company. He is further bound to show by competent evidence what damages he has sustained by reason of the alleged discharge.

In order to constitute an express contract of hiring, the contract should be definite as to all essential elements, as time, business, and compensation, and, in order to be enforced, both the parties must be bound thereby. On the part of the servant (the plaintiff in this case) there is an implied obligation to enter the master's service and serve him diligently and faithfully, to obey all his reasonable commands, treat him respectfully, and to perform the duties incident to his employment honestly, with ordinary care and due regard to his master's interest and business, and that he is competent to discharge the duties for which he is employed, that he possesses the requisite skill, and that there is nothing that unfits him physically or mentally for the duties incident to his employment. In order to justify a master in discharging a servant, the servant must have been guilty of conduct that amounts to a breach of some express or implied provision of the contract of hiring. Anything less than that will not amount to a legal justification or excuse. The question as to whether the master has waived a breach of contract by the servant by retaining him in service after knowledge of such breach is a question of fact for the jury. Prima facie it is a waiver and a condonation is presumed; but, if there are circumstances shown that tend to establish a reasonable or proper excuse for delay, it is for the jury to say whether in fact the breach was condoned. If, however, such breach has been in fact condoned, it cannot subsequently be relied on by the master to discharge the servant from the master's service. If you find that the plaintiff was incompetent, then the master would have the right to have discharged him. If you find that the plaintiff made false representations as to his qualifications, and that the master acted upon those misrepresentations and took the plaintiff into his employment, and when he found that he, the plaintiff, did not possess those qualifications, the defendant discharged him on that account, then the plaintiff could not recover. But if you find that the plaintiff entered the service of this defendant company under a contract, and if because of the fact it suited the convenience of the company to change its business, or if for any other reason not growing out of the fault of the plaintiff, it saw fit to discharge the plaintiff from its service, you would be authorized to find that there was a breach of the contract of hiring, and then you would determine what damages, if any, the plaintiff had sustained by reason of the breach of that contract, and you would be authorized to find a verdict for that amount. If, on the other hand, the representations made were false, or that the man was incompetent, or that for any of the reasons set out in this plea this defendant, the master, was justifiable in discharging the plaintiff, then your verdict should be for the defendant. Look and see what the contract of hiring was; see whether or not there has been a breach of that contract upon the part of the defendant, and what damages, if any, the plaintiff has sustained. If you find that the contract was made, and you determine there was a breach of that contract by this defendant, and you find that the amount of damages was fixed, or you can ascertain them from the evidence, then you would be authorized to find for the plaintiff. If, on the other hand, you find that the plaintiff in this case made false representations, and that this defendant, upon finding that the representations were false, discharged him, and if that was the reason of this discharge, or if for any other good reason set out in this plea this company, exercising its right to discharge him, was justified in discharging him, then your verdict should be for the defendant.

You are to try this case under the evidence you have heard on this witness stand and the rules of law given you in charge by this court, and not from the result of any other court.

—Statement by editor.

Hitch & Denmark, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Edwards & Lester, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. [1] 1. In this case, the plaintiff sued for $100, alleged to be due as salary for a time extending from April 15, 1919, to May 1, 1919. The plaintiff contended, and adduced evidence to show, that he was employed by the defendant to work for it from October 14, 1918, to October 14, 1919, for a salary of $2,400 a year, his salary being paid semimonthly, and that he was discharged and was paid nothing after April 15, 1919. The defendant contended that the contract of employment terminated on April 15, 1919; that the plaintiff had done no work for it since that date, and was due no pay. It pleaded also that the discharge was justified, in that he had been employed to work in its shipyard upon representations by him that he was perfectly competent to perform the duties to which he was assigned, whereas he proved to be incompetent. It further pleaded that he was contentious, opinionated, egotistical, and incapable of working harmoniously with those around him; that he was shifted from one department to another, but manifested the same characteristics as before; that he fought with one employee, was so disagreeable that the head of the second department in which he worked resigned; and that he was such a source of discord among the other employees that it was necessary to discharge him. Though conflicting, the evidence was sufficient to sustain the plaintiff's contentions, and this court cannot set aside the verdict.

[2] 2. The fourth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, complaining of the admission of certain documentary evidence, cannot be considered, as the evidence is not set forth in the ground or attached to it as an exhibit. Carson v. State, 23 Ga. App. 535 (3), 98 S. E. 817.

[3] 3. Refusal to permit a witness to testify as to a certain matter is not cause for a new trial where it is not shown what he would have testified or was expected to testify as to the matter if he had been allowed to do so, nor unless it appears that the party complaining of such refusal offered the testimony or asked that it be admitted, nor unless the court was informed of what it was proposed to prove by the witness. It should appear that such testimony was material and would have benefited the complaining party. This court therefore will not consider grounds of the motion for a new trial in this case which complain that "the court erred in refusing to permit" a named witness "to testify what kind of man he found the plaintiff to be," or "to testify as to the impressions derived by him as to the plaintiff with respect to his employment, from information given him" by a named person, and similar grounds which appear in the motion. See the opinion of Justice Lamar, in Griffin v. Henderson, 117 Ga. 382, 43 S. E. 712. See, also, Morris v. State, 129 Ga. 434, 59 S. E. 223; Lowe v. Burden, 22 Ga. App. 679 (1), 97 S. E. 106; Carson v. State, 22 Ga. App. 744 (7), 745, 97 S. E. 202; Kimbrel v. State, 24 Ga. App. 696, 101 S. E. 920.

[4] 4. The eleventh ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is without merit, since the ruling therein complained of was in favor of the plaintiff.

[5] 5. The twelfth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is defective because it complains of the admission in evidence of a certain letter, but the letter is not set forth in the ground or attached thereto as an exhibit.

(a) The statement of the court made while ruling upon the admissibility of this evidence did not amount to an expression or intimation of an opinion as to what had been proved in the case.

[6] 6. In the absence of an appropriate request, it is not error to fail to explain to the jury the meaning of "a preponderance of the evidence." Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Randolph, 136 Ga. 505 (4), 71 S. E. 887.

[7] 7. The charge of the court substantially set out the contentions of the plaintiff in error as contained in its plea, and the assignment that it did not do so is without merit.

[8] 8. The charge was not subject to the criticism that it failed to apply the law to the particular facts in the case.

[9] 9. Viewing the charge as a whole, it was not objectionable, in the absence of a specific request to that effect, for failing to charge more fully what constituted a breach of a contract on the part of the defendant in error.

[10-13] 10. The charge of the court was full and fair, and not subject to any of the criticisms of it made in the motion for a new trial. For no reason assigned was it error to overrule the motion for a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

HAGAN GROCERY CO. v. NOBLES.
(No. 11732.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 8, 1921.)*(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)1. Sales \S 418(12)—That seller had notice of resale by buyer must be pleaded and proved.

Where the purchaser of goods seeks to recover of the seller damages for nondelivery measured by the difference between the contract price and the price on a resale, he should both allege and prove that at the time of making the contract of sale the seller had notice of such contract of resale.

2. Sales \S 413—Evidence that buyer had resold the goods to knowledge of seller failing to deliver held not admissible.

In action by buyer for failure to deliver goods, in which complaint failed to allege that seller had notice of intended resale, rejection of evidence that seller had knowledge of a resale, and as to expenses of purchasing other goods to fill contract of resale, is not error.

3. Customs and usages \S 18—Petition held not to authorize proof of custom to resell, in advance, oranges bought.

In an action by buyer for failure to deliver carload of oranges purchased, petition held not to contain any allegations that would warrant proof of the usual custom in trade of the wholesale purchaser of oranges in carload lots to resell them in advance.

4. Sales \S 418(2)—Market price of goods not delivered at time after breach and place other than delivery not admissible.

In action for breach of contract to deliver a car of oranges, exclusion of evidence of market price at place other than place of delivery and at time after the breach held not error.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; H. B. Spooner, Judge.

Action by the Hagan Grocery Company against W. H. Nobles. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

So much of the petition as was material was as follows:

(3) Your petitioner alleges that on or about October 10, 1918, it purchased from W. H. Nobles one car of Indian River oranges, consisting of 400 crates, to be shipped to your petitioner on December 10, 1918, at Donaldsonville, Ga., and for which it was agreed that your petitioner was to pay the defendant on delivery the sum of $3.85 per crate, or a total of $1,540.50, said fruit to be in prime condition and to be of good merchantable quality.

(4) Your petitioner alleges that said contract of sale was duly confirmed about October 10, 1918, and your petitioner, after purchasing said oranges, sold the same to its trade before the same arrived at Donaldsonville, assuming that the defendant would perform his contract as made and entered into.

(5) Your petitioner alleges that the defendant did, on December 10, 1918, ship to your petitioner a car of oranges, consisting of 400 crates, which arrived at Donaldsonville, about December 13, 1918, in a badly damaged condition, about 50 per cent. of the same being rotten and damaged, and having been damaged for a period of several days before being shipped to your petitioner.

(6) That the oranges shipped to your petitioner were practically worthless, and about 50 per cent. of same were unsalable, and your petitioner declined to accept the same, and requested the defendant to ship another car in order to complete his contract as made and entered into with your petitioner, which the defendant declined and refused to do.

(7) Petitioner alleges that by reason of the failure of the defendant to perform its contract petitioner was compelled to go into the market and buy other oranges at much higher price in order to fill its contract with its customers, and in so doing it suffered a loss by reason of so doing in the amount herein sued for.

Exceptions to introduction of evidence not sufficiently indicated in the opinion of the court were as follows:

Because the court erred in excluding from the consideration of the jury, on objection of counsel for defendant in the court below, the following material evidence of the witness A. G. Hagan, president and general manager of the Hagan Grocery Company, the same being ruled out by the court on the ground that the price would be at the place of delivery, and not at some other point than the place of delivery, the questions and answers ruled out being as follows:

"Q. Mr. Hagan, you tried to get Indian River oranges from several brokers, after Mr. Nobles refused to ship you another car, did you not? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Were you unable to get them nearer than Jacksonville, Fla.? A. The only place I was able to get them at all was Jacksonville, Fla.

"Q. What were Indian River oranges worth at that time at Jacksonville, Fla., and were you familiar with quotations at that time on Indian River oranges? A. Yes, sir; they were worth at that time $5 per crate at Jacksonville, Fla."

The foregoing evidence was excluded from the jury by the court on objection of counsel for defendant on the ground that the plaintiff was restricted to proving the market price on the date of the breach of the contract, and when oranges were purchased in lieu of those which the seller had declined to furnish, at the time and place of sale.

Because the court erred in excluding from the consideration of the jury the following material evidence of the witness A. G. Hagan, president and manager of the Hagan Grocery Company, on objection of counsel for defendant, the evidence excluded being substantially as follows:

"Q. Mr. Hagan did you try to locate any Indian River oranges when you were unable to purchase them at Titusville, Fla.? A. I could not locate any except at Jacksonville, Fla.

"Q. You couldn't locate any at any price? A. I couldn't locate any at all, except at Jacksonville, and price wasn't an object.

"Q. What was the best price that you could obtain Indian River oranges for, such as you had contracted with Mr. Nobles to deliver to you? A. $5 per crate f. o. b. Jacksonville, Fla."

The court on objection of defendant ruled out the foregoing evidence, and excluded the same from the consideration of the jury, and plaintiff in the court below then and there excepted, and here and now excepts, and says that the court erred in excluding said evidence from the consideration of the jury.

Because the court erred in withholding and excluding from the consideration of the jury the following material evidence of the witness A. G. Hagan, the same being substantially as follows:

"Q. Mr. Hagan what was the contract price you were to pay Mr. Nobles for the oranges? A. I was to pay him $3.85 per crate.

"Q. Mr. Hagan how much were you afterwards compelled to pay for these same oranges in Jacksonville, Fla.? A. $5 per crate.

"Q. Mr. Hagan, what amount per crate did your company lose on account of having to repurchase the oranges, after Mr. Nobles had failed to deliver the same? A. $1.15 per crate."

Counsel for defendant objected to this evidence on the ground that the same was irrelevant and immaterial, and because there was no pleading to justify the same, and on this objection the court declined to permit the evidence to go to the jury.

Because the court erred in excluding from the evidence the following material testimony of the witness A. G. Hagan, the testimony being substantially as follows:

"Q. Mr. Hagan, do you know what the market price was for Indian River oranges, such as those contracted for from Mr. Nobles, in Donalsonville, on or about December 13, 1919? A. There was no market price for Indian River oranges in Donalsonville, Ga., during the month of December, 1918, for the reason that there were none to be had at that point, and they could not be bought in Donalsonville."

Because the court declined to permit the witness A. G. Hagan, for plaintiff, to answer the following material questions, which were propounded by counsel for plaintiff in the court below. Counsel stating what answer was expected of the witness, the question and answer being substantially as follows:

"Q. Mr. Hagan, did you undertake or make any effort to purchase Indian River oranges at Donalsonville, Ga., on December 13, 1918, which was the date the car arrived from Titusville, and, if so, state the best price you were able to get on Indian River oranges? A. I tried to purchase Indian River oranges, such as those contracted for, at Donalsonville and all nearby points, but was unable to locate any except at Jacksonville, Fla., which was the nearest and only place where they could be obtained, and the price paid was $5 per crate f. o. b. Jacksonville."

John R. Wilson and Handley C. Harrison, both of Bainbridge, for plaintiff in error.

J. C. Hale and W. V. Custer, both of Bainbridge, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. [1] 1. Where the purchaser of goods seeks to recover of the seller damages for nondelivery, measured by the difference between the contract price and the price on a resale, he should both allege and prove that at the time of making the contract of the sale the seller had notice of such contract of resale. See Truitt v. Rust & Shelburne Sales Co., 25 Ga. App. 62, 102 S. E. 645 (1).

[2] 2. Where the buyer in such a case fails to allege in his petition that the seller knew of the contract of resale, and no demurrer or motion to dismiss is interposed, the plaintiff has the right to prove his case as laid, but it is not error to repel all evidence tending to show knowledge of the seller at the time of the sale of the intended resale. See Kelly v. Strouse, 116 Ga. 872 (4), 43 S. E. 280.

3. Nor was it error, in the absence of an appropriate allegation in the petition, to reject evidence as to expenses incurred by the buyer in purchasing other oranges to fulfill his contracts of resale.

[3] 4. The petition contained no allegation that would warrant proof of the "usual custom of trade of the wholesaler purchasing oranges in carload lots to sell them in advance to the retail trade."

[4] 5. There was no merit in any of the other exceptions as to the introduction of evidence.

6. The plaintiff having failed to prove any ascertainable damages, his petition was not proven as laid, and it was not error to grant a nonsuit. Kelly v. Strouse, supra.

Judgment affirmed.

TICKNOR v. SPENCE. (No. 12073.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
April 14, 1921.)(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Brokers ¶71—Offer to sell for certain price not agreement to pay excess above such price to broker.

A real estate owner's statement to a broker that he would sell the property for a certain sum net to him was not an offer or agreement to pay the broker the excess above such price of any amount paid by a purchaser obtained by the broker.

Error from City Court of Albany; Clayton Jones, Judge.

Action by T. M. Ticknor against R. E. L. Spence, Sr. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

R. H. Ferrell, of Albany, for plaintiff in error.

Lippitt & Burt, of Albany, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. 1. The owner of certain real estate wrote to a broker that he would sell the property for a certain sum net to him (the owner), and the broker procured a purchaser who was able, willing, and ready to buy at a price in excess of the amount named, but the owner refused to sell. Held, that the terms of the agreement on the part of the owner did not import an offer on his part to pay the broker the excess in the amount which the purchaser was willing to pay for the property, above the sum named, for which the owner was willing to sell it.

2. A petition alleging the foregoing facts and praying for judgment for a sum equal to the excess in the amount at which the alleged purchaser was willing to buy, above the "net" amount at which the owner was willing to sell, was demurrable. Matheney, Beasley & Koon v. Godin, 130 Ga. 713, 61 S. E. 703.

Judgment affirmed.

BROYLES, C. J., concur.

LUKE, J. (dissenting). I think, upon the particular facts pleaded in this case, we might distinguish it from the case of Matheney, Beasley & Koon v. Godin, 130 Ga. 713, 61 S. E. 703. In the opinion of the writer the petition is sufficient to show a contract whereby the broker was to receive for his services the sum in excess of the price at which the owner agreed to sell the property.

JARRETT v. McKINNON. (No. 11781.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
April 14, 1921.)(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ¶176—Purchaser entitled to apportionment of price when deficiency justifies inference of fraud.

Where a sale of land is by the tract described as containing a certain number of acres "more or less," the purchaser may obtain an apportionment of the purchase price upon proof of such a deficiency in acreage as justifies the inference that the sale was induced by actual fraud.

2. Vendor and purchaser ¶34—Exhibition of deed misrepresenting acreage may constitute "fraud" justifying apportionment of price.

Under Civ. Code 1910, § 4626, providing that slight circumstances may carry conviction of the existence of fraud, and section 4622, providing that actual fraud consists in any artifice by which another is deceived, a vendor's exhibition to the purchaser of a deed, indicating that the land contained 319 acres, when in fact it contained 157 acres less, might constitute actual fraud, entitling the purchaser to an apportionment of the price, where the deficiency was known to the vendor, but unknown to the purchaser.

Error from City Court of Thomasville; W. M. Hammond, Judge.

Action by J. A. McKinnon against F. M. Jarrett. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Titus, Dekle & Hopkins, of Thomasville, for plaintiff in error.

Branch & Snow, of Quitman, for defendant in error.

STEPHENS, J. [1] 1. Where there is a sale and conveyance of land by the tract, described in the conveyance as containing so many acres, with the qualifying words "more or less," the purchaser may defend against a suit for the purchase money and obtain an apportionment in the purchase price, upon proof of a deficiency in the number of acres, and that there was such a deficiency as to justify the inference that the sale was induced by actual fraud. See, in this connection, Emlen v. Roper, 133 Ga. 726, 66 S. E. 934; Kendall v. Wells, 126 Ga. 343, 55 S. E. 41.

[2] 2. "Fraud, being in itself subtle, slight circumstances may be sufficient to carry conviction of its existence" (Civil Code 1910, § 4626); and, since "actual fraud consists in any kind of artifice by which another is deceived" (Civil Code of 1910, § 4622), it follows that where a vendor, in order to induce a sale of land, even though the land is to be sold by the tract, exhibits to the purchaser and produces, for his inspection a deed to the tract from another party to the vendor, which deed indicates that the land contains so many acres, to wit, 319, more or less, when as a matter of fact the tract sold is deficient in the number of acres by nearly one-half (to wit, 157 acres) of the number of acres indicated in the deed exhibited, which deficiency is known to the vendor but unknown to the purchaser, such act on the part of the vendor in exhibiting such conveyance to the purchaser is such as may amount to a false representation as to the size of the tract and thereby constitute actual fraud upon the purchaser.

3. In a suit by the vendor for the purchase price of the land, it was error to strike the defendant's plea, setting up the above facts by way of defense, and for the purpose of obtaining an apportionment of the purchase price.

NATIONAL CASH REGISTER CO. v. G. G. HENDERSON FURNITURE CO.
(No. 11980.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
April 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Sales §50—Substituted contract may be rescinded for fraud, notwithstanding waiver of fraud in first contract.

Where a cash register was not as represented by the seller and a new contract was made for another cash register, the buyer's waiver of the fraud in the procurement of the first contract, by executing the second contract with knowledge of its existence, did not prevent rescission of the second contract for false and fraudulent representations in connection with its procurement.

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Action by the National Cash Register Company against the G. G. Henderson Furniture Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Dowling & Askew, of Moultrie, for plaintiff in error.

Hill & Gibson, of Moultrie, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. The defendant bought from the plaintiff a cash register on express warranty that it would give certain definite results. He made a cash payment and gave his notes for the balance of the purchase price. On receipt of the register it was found to be defective in its physical construction, and would not perform the particular kind of work demanded by the defendant and which at the time of the purchase the plaintiff represented it would perform. The plaintiff admitted these defects and entered into a new contract with the defendant to furnish another register of exactly the kind described by the defendant as necessary to his business. Relying upon these statements made to him by the plaintiff the defendant agreed to the second contract. When the second register was delivered to the defendant for use, he discovered, after thoroughly testing it, that the representations and statements of the plaintiff as to the efficiency of the register to perform the work demanded were false and fraudulent. When defendant discovered that the second contract had been secured from him by these false and fraudulent representations, he promptly tendered the register back to the plaintiff, while it was in the condition in which he had received it, and demanded the return of the cash paid as the initial payment on the first contract and a rescission of the second contract. The plaintiff refused compliance with the defendant's demand, and brought suit on the purchase-money notes executed at the time of the purchase of the first register. The defendant filed an answer, setting up substantially the facts stated above, and assumed the burden, and the verdict was in his favor. The plaintiff's motion for a new trial, based on the general grounds alone, was overruled.

Held, the trial judge did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial. The principle that, even if there had been fraud in the procurement of the first contract, it was waived by the defendant when he executed the second contract with knowledge of its existence has no application, because here fraud is also alleged in connection with procurement of the second contract.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal and error \S 15 — Writ of error not maintainable in cases tried together on one motion for new trial and bill of exceptions.

Where separate cases between the same parties were by agreement tried together, but there were two separate verdicts, a single motion for a new trial and a single bill of exceptions will not support a writ of error.

LUKE, J. 1. It is recited in the bill of exceptions in this case that by agreement of counsel the issues upon two separate cases between the same parties were tried together before one jury. The record shows there were two separate verdicts. The plaintiff in error filed only one motion for a new trial, in which complaint is made as to the admissibility of evidence, and certain errors are assigned upon excerpts from the charge of the court. The plaintiff in error undertakes to have both cases considered on one motion for a new trial, and presents only one bill of exceptions, to bring into question the legality of the two verdicts in the two separa-rate cases. Under the ruling of this court in Jones v. Marll, 19 Ga. App. 216 (4), 91 S. E. 445, and cases there cited, this writ of error must be dismissed.

HILL, J. Suit in a justice's court was brought upon a promissory note for the principal sum of $55 and during the trial in that court the defendant's attorney entered a credit of $10 on the note, and judgment was thereupon rendered for the plaintiff for $45 principal, besides interest; and within the time allowed by law the defendant filed an appeal to the superior court. When the case was called in the superior court counsel for the plaintiff moved to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the court was without jurisdiction, as the amount in controversy was less than $50, and this motion was sustained, and the appeal dismissed. Held error. The right to appeal is fixed by the pleadings, and not by reductions which may be made at the trial in the justice's court, nor by the amount of the final judgment. Hart v. Gordon, 8 Ga. WRIGHT v. BELL. (No. 11973.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
April 14, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)*Landlord and tenant \S 331(6)—in proceeding on distress warrant, undisputed facts held to demand verdict for landlord.Where there was no evidence to support a verdict for the defendant, and positive and unequivocal evidence demanded a verdict for the plaintiff, for a specific amount, a verdict for the defendant should have been set aside as being contrary to law.Error from Superior Court, Barrow County; A. J. Cobb, Judge.Action by M. A. Wright against Zion Bell.
Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.A distress warrant was levied for rent alleged to be due in 1917. A counter affidavit was made and bond given, as provided by statute, and on the trial of the issue thus made the verdict was adverse to the plaintiff. Her motion for a new trial was overruled, and she excepted. The evidence in her behalf, substantially stated, makes the following case: The defendant rented 100 acres of land from the plaintiff in the year 1917 under a contract to pay her one-third of the corn and one-fourth of the cotton to be grown on the rented land, she to pay for one-half of the fertilizers used by the tenant.
The plaintiff and four witnesses testified positively that in the year 1917 the tenant made 30 bales of cotton and no corn; that early in January, 1918, he settled with her for 23 bales of cotton according to the contract; that after this partial settlement hemade and sold 7 bales more, for which he had made no settlement and paid no part of the rent. It was admitted that no corn had been made. It was also admitted by the plaintiff that she owed one-fourth of the cost of the fertilizer for the year 1917, the total amount being $247.50. The plaintiff proved also that the market price of cotton during the month of January averaged 31 cents per pound. The defendant introduced no evidence.J. C. Knox, of Monroe, for plaintiff in error.Lewis C. Russell and Jos. D. Quillian, both of Winder, for defendant in error.HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above).
We are somewhat puzzled to understand why the jury found the verdict. The evidence indisputably demanded a verdict for the plaintiff. Counsel for the defendant in error, in his brief, states as the only reason for the verdict that—"The plaintiff had not proved any definite amount of cotton or corn that had been raised or produced by the defendant, and left the jury absolutely without any evidence from which it could reasonably calculate that the defendant was due the plaintiff any amount as rent."This conclusion seems not to be supported by the undisputed evidence, which was unequivocally that the defendant had made 30 bales of cotton and no corn; that he had settled with the plaintiff for 23 bales, but had not settled for the 7 additional bales. The market price of cotton for the month of January, 1918, when the balance of the rent should have been paid, was proved to have been 31 cents per pound, and it was admitted by the plaintiff that she owed one-fourth of the balance of the fertilizer which she had agreed to pay; the total amount being $247.50. It was but a plain, simple mathematical calculation, from the undisputed evidence, as to how much cotton the defendant had raised for the year 1917, how much he had settled for, and how much he still owed after deducting from the balance of the rent the amount due by the plaintiff for fertilizers. The special grounds of error set out in the motion for a new trial and approved as true by the judge were:First, "that the court erred in not submitting to the jury in his charge, under the evidence in said case, the question of whether or not the defendant, Zion Bell, had settled with the plaintiff, Mrs. M. A. Wright, for the seven bales of rent cotton in controversy gathered by the defendant from plaintiff's farm, in which the plaintiff contended that he had not";
and, second, "that the court erred in not submitting to the jury the question of whether or not the defendant had settled with the plaintiff for the cotton seed from the seven bales of cotton in controversy, gathered by the defendant from plaintiff's farm, in which the plaintiff contended in said case that he had not."

As these two items constituted the matters to be determined, upon which there was direct and positive proof for the plaintiff and none for the defendant, it is possible that the failure of the trial judge to charge the jury upon these two issues left the jury under the impression that there was no issue before them for determination. However this may be, it is manifest that the verdict against the plaintiff was contrary to law, as there is not a scintilla of evidence to support it, and as the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff clearly demanded a verdict for the plaintiff for a definite amount, proved by the evidence in her behalf, and that a new trial should be granted on this general ground, irrespective of any error excepted to in the two special grounds of the motion.

BONNETT v. STATE. (No. 12001.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
April 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Animals ¶45—Circumstantial evidence held insufficient to support conviction for killing of cows.

"The evidence against the accused was entirely circumstantial, and, while it raised a suspicion of his guilt, was not sufficient, though given its strongest intendment as against him, to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis. It was therefore error to refuse a new trial." Williams v. State, 113 Ga. 721, 39 S. E. 487.

Error from City Court of Statesboro; W. H. Lanier, Judge.

J. F. Bonnett was convicted of maliciously maiming and killing cows and a steer, and he brings error. Reversed.

R. Lee Moore, of Statesboro, for plaintiff in error.

H. M. Jones, J. R. Roach, Sol., and Deal & Renfro, all of Statesboro, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. The accusation in this case alleged that the accused did "maliciously maim and kill" two cows and a small steer. The accusation does not allege in what manner they were killed, but the record shows that the state endeavored to prove that they were shot on a certain Saturday afternoon. While the steer was found dead in the field of the accused, and one of the cows near this field, there is no evidence that either of these had been shot, but it was shown that they had been in a field where peas, corn, and ground peas were growing. The evidence shows that it had been raining just before the dead cattle were found, that the steer was found in a flat place in the field, and that there had been water in the place where he was found; and one witness swore that the cow laid down in the edge of a pond of water and died, that he examined the contents of her paunch and found therein "a pile of food that consisted of pea vines, pea hulls, and fodder stems," that "where cows eat too much green peas, or dry peas and pea vines, it will kill them," and that he believed that eating peas and drinking water caused the death of both of these cattle. The other cow lived several days. The only evidence to show that she was shot was a hole that was found in her "tripe"; but, granting that this was sufficient proof that she had been shot, there is no evidence to show that this particular cow had been on the premises of the accused, and none to show that he had shot her.

It was the contention of the state, as stated above, that the cattle were shot on Saturday afternoon, and that this killing occurred at or near the home of the accused. There was some evidence that gunshots were heard in the direction of the farm of the accused on Saturday afternoon, but no evidence that the accused fired these shots. The uncontradicted evidence shows that the accused was away from home practically all that afternoon after 2 o'clock and some time prior thereto. The defendant was convicted on circumstantial evidence, and we do not think it sufficient to show beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused did "maliciously maim and kill" the cattle, or that it "excludes every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused." Penal Code 1910, § 1010. As was said in Henderson v. State, 147 Ga. 134(2), 92 S. E. 871:

"The verdict in this case is dependent entirely on circumstantial evidence. The proved facts are consistent with innocence, and are insufficient to exclude every reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused. Suspicion of guilt will not authorize a conviction."

The evidence in this case may point toward the guilt of the accused, but—"the law recognizes that there may be evidence pointing to guilt, without that evidence being sufficient to warrant conviction." Patton v. State, 117 Ga. 230(3), 43 S. E. 533.

In Davis v. State, 17 Ga. App. 820, 88 S. E. 706, Judge Wade said:

"Summing up the entire evidence, it may be said that, while it is sufficient to create a strong suspicion as to the guilt of the accused, it by no means comes up to the rule that circumstantial evidence must exclude every other reasonable hypothesis than that of the guilt of the accused, in order to support a conviction of crime."

See also Phillips v. State, 17 Ga. App. 824(1), 88 S. E. 716, and cases cited; Bowen v. State, 19 Ga. App. 782, 92 S. E. 299.

The court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial in this case. As a new trial must follow from the above ruling, it is unnecessary to consider the other grounds of the motion for a new trial. The errors alleged therein are of such a character that they will not likely recur when the case is tried again.

The evidence in the present case, in addition to the description of the land contained in the written obligation to sell, clearly showing that the sale of the land was by the acre and not by the tract, a reduction of the price in proportion to the deficiency of the land was the legal right of the vendee at his option. *Owens v. STATE v. JONES. (No. 378.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 27, 1921.)

1. Criminal law \S 556(6)—Court's remarks on accused's testimony not error.

Where accused, a witness in his own behalf, had been testifying for some little time and had said nothing material or relevant to the issue, notwithstanding efforts of the court to direct his statements to the matters on issue, the court's comment, "Up to now the defendant's personal testimony was like a Georgia lake, a mile wide and an inch deep," was not erroneous as violating O. S. \S 564, prohibiting the expression of the judge's opinion in the trial of cases before a jury; the remark being necessarily to be understood as a mere pleasantry, and not intended as a comment adverse to the witness on his character or veracity or the weight of his evidence on any essential feature of the charge, but on the rambling and irrelevant nature of his statements to this time.

2. Indictment and Information \S 188—To justify conviction of assault by man over 18, on indictment for assault with intent to rape, bill need not state that defendant was over 18.

Where defendant was prosecuted for assault with intent to rape, a conviction of assault on a female by a man over 18 years of age was not erroneous because there was no charge in the bill that at the time of the alleged assault accused was over 18, where the proof clearly showed that he was over 18 at that time and on the trial no question was made as to that fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; J. Bis Ray, Judge.

Charlie Jones was convicted of an assault on a female, and appeals. No error:

The indictment is for assault with intent to commit rape on one Lillian Marshall, tried before his honor, J. Bis Ray, judge, and a jury at December term, 1920, of the superior court of Guilford county. The jury rendered a verdict of guilty of an assault on a female.

S. B. Adams and R. C. Strudwick, both of Greensboro, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. [1] It is chiefly urged for error that, while the defendant was on the stand as a witness in his own behalf, the court, in endeavoring to bring the witness to testify on matters relevant to the issue, made comment:

"Up to now the defendant's personal testimony was like a Georgia lake, a mile wide and an inch deep."

This court has always been very careful to enforce the provision of the statute which prohibits a judge from expression of opinion in the trial of causes before the jury, Consolidated Statutes, \S 564, extending the inhibition to such expression in the hearing of the jury at any time during the trial, and whether the objectionable comments may be towards the testimony offered, the witness testifying, or the litigant and the cause he is endeavoring to maintain. State v. Rogers, 173 N. C. 755, 91 S. E. 854, L. R. A. 1917E, 857; State v. Harria, 166 N. C. 243, 80 S. E. 1087; State v. Cook, 162 N. C. 586, 77 S. E. 759; Park v. Exum, 156 N. C. 228, 72 S. E. 309; Withers v. Lane, 144 N. C. 184, 56 S. E. 855; State v. Dick, 60 N. C. 440, 36 Am. Dec. 439.

In the present instance, however, while the comments objected to may have been ill advised, we are of opinion that they should not be held for reversible error, because, from the facts and attendant circumstances disclosed in the record, it appears that they were made and necessarily understood as a mere pleasantry, and could have reasonably had no appreciable effect on the result. The defendant, a witness in his own behalf, had been testifying for some little time and had said nothing material or relevant to the issue. The judge, with commendable patience, had requested his counsel to direct the statements of the witness to the matters on issue, the judge himself had tried more than once, and in another effort in this direction made the remark objected to. It was not intended or understood as a comment adverse to the witness on his character or veracity or the weight of his evidence on any essential feature of the charge, but on the rambling and irrelevant nature of the witness' statements to that time. And herein the instant case differs from that of State v. Rogers, to which we were cited on the argument. There a defendant, testifying in his own behalf, was told by the presiding judge "to answer the question more concisely and quit dodging," an adverse comment on the witness both as to his manner and the weight of his statements well calculated to prejudice defendant and his cause in the estimate of the jury.

[2] Defendant excepted further and moved on arrest of judgment that there was no charge in the bill that defendant had made an assault on a female, he being at the time over 18. The proof clearly showed that the defendant was over 18 at the time of the alleged assault, and on the trial no question was made as to that fact. On the form of the bill the objection was expressly resolved against the defendant in State v. Smith, 157 N. C. 578, 72 S. E. 853.

On the record, there has been no error shown that would justify the court in disturbing the results of the trial, and the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

No error.

MARSHALL v. INTERSTATE TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO. et al. (No. 331.)*

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 27, 1921.)

Evidence  472(5)—Opinion as to whether place where servant was working was safe held inadmissible under shorthand statement of fact rule.

The exception to the rule against opinion evidence permitting a "shorthand statement of fact" or the statement of a "composite or compound fact," while favored by the courts in a proper case, does not render admissible an opinion upon the exact issue to be determined by the jury; so that in an action by telephone company employee against that company and a traction company from uninsulated wires, where the pleadings raised the issue that defendants failed to furnish plaintiff a safe place to work, and the facts were few and easily understood—two sets of wires on one pole, the voltage of the wires, their proximity, their state of insulation, the fact that they passed through a sycamore tree with swaying limbs, at which place plaintiff was injured—it was error to permit a witness to express the opinion that the place where plaintiff was working was not safe.

Hoke, J., and Clark, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; Allen, Judge.

Action by Frank H. Marshall against the Interstate Telephone & Telegraph Company and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. New trial.

This is an action brought by the plaintiff, a minor, through his next friend, to recover damages for the loss of his arm and other injuries resulting from the alleged negligence of the two defendants.

The plaintiff offered evidence tending to prove the following facts:

The plaintiff was 19 years of age at the time of his injury in October, 1919. He was employed by the defendant Interstate Telephone & Telegraph Company in 1918 as general utility boy or apprentice lineman, at $2 per day, and had been climbing poles some 4 to 6 months prior to the injury, and was then getting $3 per day. He had been working for the defendant telephone company about 14 months.

On October 21, 1919, L. D. Darnell, four colored laborers, and plaintiff composed the crew of the defendant telephone company that was sent to Vickers avenue, in the city of Durham, N. C., to string two new telephone wires down said avenue southwardly from Chapel Hill street and along the west side of Vickers avenue. Both of the defendants had poles and wires along the west side of said avenue, and at some places the wires were attached to the same poles and at others to separate poles. The poles of the telephone company were taller than the traction company poles, and the phone wires were above the power wires of the defendant traction company. About three or four poles southward from Chapel Hill street, and in a line with said poles and wires, there was a sycamore tree as tall or taller than the highest poles and wires, with a large number of outspreading branches, through which the wires of both the defendants run and mix together through the branches of said tree, and in some instances are from four to six inches apart. The insulation was worn off of the electric power wires, which carry a voltage of 2,300, in several places in and near the sycamore tree. The distance between the cross-arms of the two companies are not uniform, but run from fourteen inches to two feet apart. At one place near where the plaintiff was injured the power of primary wires of the traction company are separated from the telephone company's wires only by the thickness of a piece of plank or board. The defendant traction company had two 2,300-voltage primary or power wires and one arc circuit, and the telephone company from 40 to 60 wires running along this line. The telephone wires carry no voltage or electricity, and within themselves are not dangerous to handle.

When the crew arrived at Vickers avenue for the purpose of stringing phone wires, plaintiff would climb one pole and Darnell the other, and the colored laborers would throw up the tie ropes and play off the wire. When plaintiff had gone up the fifth pole, to which pole the wires of both companies are attached, and had passed the cross-arm carrying the wires of the traction company, and had dead-ended one of the new wires he was stringing, and with his spikes fastened in the pole and with one hand holding iron brace he had leaned back a little and was waiting for the tie rope, with the other wire, to be thrown to him, he was caught with an electric current, severely burning his hand and shoulder, and remained there until he was burned into unconsciousness, from 30 to 40 minutes, and until the fire department came and took him down.

There was evidence on the part of the defendants in contradiction of much of the evidence of the plaintiff.

A witness for the plaintiff who had examined the place of the injury was asked the following question:

"State whether or not the conditions as you found them over there of these wires were in a safe condition."

To which question the defendants objected. Objection overruled, and defendants excepted. The witness answered that they were not safe.

There were other exceptions taken by defendants, not necessary to be stated.

*Rehearing denied 107 S. E. 498.

There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and defendants appealed.

Bryant & Brogden and W. L. Foushee, all of Durham, for appellant Durham Traction Co.

Fuller, Reade & Fuller, of Durham, for appellant Interstate Telephone & Telegraph Co.

Brawley & Gantt, of Durham, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The general rule is that the opinion of a witness is not competent evidence; he must state facts, and let the jury form the opinion. Horton v. Green, 64 N. C. 66.

There is, however, a well-recognized exception to the rule, and "it includes the evidence of common observers testifying the results of their observations made at the time in regard to common appearances, facts and conditions which cannot be reproduced and made palpable to a jury." Britt v. Railroad, 148 N. C. 41, 61 S. E. 601.

This is sometimes spoken of as the "short-hand statement of a fact" or as the statement of a "composite or compound fact," several circumstances combining to make another fact, and the tendency of the courts is to enlarge, and not restrict, this class of evidence (Lumber Co. v. Railroad, 151 N. C. 221, 65 S. E. 920), because frequently its exclusion would prevent the proper development of the cause of action or defense, and injurious effect, if the statement of the witness is not true, may be obviated by cross-examination and the intelligence of the jury.

We have permitted witnesses to testify that a pole on which wires were strung could have been placed differently and a source of danger eliminated (Horne v. Power Co., 144 N. C. 378, 57 S. E. 19); that two chains would be safer than one, a fact which, it would seem, would be self-evident (Britt v. Railroad, 148 N. C. 41, 61 S. E. 601); that a core used in manufacturing iron was defectively made (Alley v. Pipe Co., 159 N. C. 328, 74 S. E. 885); that a voltage of 110 was not dangerous (Monds v. Dunn, 163 N. C. 110, 79 S. E. 303); and there are other instances, but the exception has as its foundation necessity, arising from the difficulty, and frequently the impossibility, of so placing a number of complicated facts before a jury that the proper deduction may be drawn from them, when a single statement, conveying the impression on the mind of the witness of all the facts, the combination considered together constituting a fact, could be easily understood, and the exception is subject to the limitation that the opinion or inference of the witness must not be on the exact issue to be determined by the jury.

As said in McKelvey on Evidence, p. 176:

"It is a method of placing before the jury, in a general and broad way, a group of facts which, in detail, would be difficult of description, but which, as a whole, make up a certain conception, grasped at once by the mind.

"The admissibility of such evidence does not extend to cases where it would not prove helpful to the jury, nor where its application would carry the witness into an expression of real opinion upon matters which it is the jury's province to decide."

This rule, excluding the opinion of a witness on the point in issue, has been approved in Summerlin v. Railroad, 133 N. C. 550, 45 S. E. 898, Lynch v. Mfg. Co., 167 N. C. 99, 83 S. E. 6, and in other cases.

Applying these principles, it was error to permit the witness to express the opinion that the place where the plaintiff was working was not safe.

The facts were few and easily understood—two sets of wires on one pole, the voltage of the wires, their proximity, whether without insulation or not, the fact that they passed through a sycamore tree with swaying limbs, the injury to the plaintiff—and the jury ought to have been permitted to draw the inferences from the evidence instead of the witness.

It was also an expression of opinion on the most important issue raised by the pleadings; it being alleged in the complaint and denied in the answer that the defendants failed to furnish the plaintiff a safe place to work.

In view of the pleadings the witness might as well have been permitted to say that in his opinion the defendants were negligent as to say that the place where the plaintiff was working was not safe.

In Marks v. Cotton Mills, 135 N. C. 289, 47 S. E. 432, the court, while discussing the admissibility of an opinion expressed by a witness, uses language very pertinent here. The court says:

"The witness, in our judgment, was permitted to invade the province of the court and the jury in thus testifying. A witness should state facts, the jury should find the facts, and the court should declare and explain the law. The functions of the three within their several spheres are clearly defined and should always be kept separate and distinct. Whether the speeder was so constructed as that its operation was safe to the defendant's employees was the very question upon which the parties were at issue and which the jury were impaneled to decide. The witness' opinion upon that question was incompetent, and the plaintiff's objection to it should have been sustained."

The case of Hoyle v. Hickory, 167 N. C. 221, 83 S. E. 738, does not decide that a witness may say that certain conduct was negligent, but that the opinion of experts as to whether streets were properly graded were not conclusive on the jury.

There must be a new trial.

New trial.

HOKE, J. (dissenting). I am unable to concur in the decision awarding a new trial on the ground stated in the opinion. There are facts in evidence tending to show that on October 21, 1919, the defendants, the telephone and telegraph company and the traction company, had their poles and wires along Vickers avenue in the city of Durham and at places and at the point of the occurrence three wires were strung upon the same poles; that the telephone company's wires were in themselves harmless, but the wires of the traction company, two primary wires, each carried 2,300 voltage, and that, while it was at times permitted to place such wires on same poles, there were recognized rules for the placing of the wires, established by municipal regulations, as necessary to the safety of employees and others engaged in working with or about the same which had been violated; that at the time of the occurrence plaintiff, employed as lineman by the telephone company, was engaged with others in stringing some additional wires, and as he ascended one of the poles for the purpose he was caught by a current of electricity transmitted from the traction wires and held helpless for some 35 or 40 minutes, and had his arm burned off, or so severely that amputation became necessary, and received other severe burns which caused him great suffering and seriously impaired his health and strength, etc. For this injury, caused by the alleged negligence of both defendants, after an arduous trial involving expenditure of much time and strength and incurring of much cost and expense, plaintiff has been awarded compensatory damages by the jury, and all this is to be entirely done away with because, as stated, a witness was allowed to say over defendant's objection that at the time and place of the injury the wires of the two companies were not in a safe condition, and this on the ground chiefly that the witness was thereby giving an opinion as to a principal question involved in the issue. The witness who was allowed to make this statement was Chester Whitaker, the city electrician, and had been for more than 7 years. He was on the ground about 30 minutes after the occurrence, when there was no suggestion of any change, and he spoke from personal observation of the facts and conditions to which he testified; that he had formerly been employed by the traction company for 8 years and by the Carolina Light & Power Company for 2 years, and had had 12 or 14 years' experience in this line of work. And in further bearing on the correctness of his honor's ruling in this matter it appears from the record and without substantial dispute that 40 or 50 feet west of the pole on which plaintiff received his injuries the wires of both companies ran through a sycamore tree, and there the insulation of the primary wires of the traction company had worn off for 2 or 3 inches, and that the swaying boughs of the tree afforded a not improbable means of connection between this exposed wire carrying, as stated, a 2,300 voltage and the telephone wires of the other defendant, and that 60 to 80 feet east of the place of injury the wires of the telephone company were carried over a small piece of plank laid on the top of the glass knobs or insulators of a cross-arm of a traction company pole and affording a separation between these wires and the high voltage wires of the traction company of not more than 6 inches.

From this, a statement of the facts chiefly relevant to the question, presented and considered in connection with the fact also admitted that plaintiff in performing his duty as lineman for the telephone company had been caught by a strong current of electricity and held for 35 or 40 minutes and till his arm was practically burned off and other serious injuries inflicted, the testimony objected to should not be held for reversible error for the reason that it was entirely harmless. The danger of the conditions presented would seem to stand revealed.

The wholesome principle that a new trial should not be granted for slight errors which could have worked no substantial prejudice to appellant's cause has been again and again approved in our decisions and has nowhere been stated more clearly than in a recent case of Brewer v. Ring, etc., 177 N. C. 476, 484, 99 S. E. 358, 362, where Associate Justice Walker, in delivering the opinion, said:

"Courts do not lightly grant reversals, or set aside verdicts, on grounds which show the alleged error to be harmless or where the appellant could have sustained no injury from it. There should be at least something like practical treatment of a motion to reverse, and it should not be granted except to subserve the ends of substantial justice. Hilliard on New Trials (2d Ed.) §§ 1-7."

The same position was stated with approval and applied in a subsequent decision, Powell v. Railroad, 178 N. C. 243, 100 S. E. 424, where, in reference to some trivial error suggested in the course of the trial, the court said:

"No jury could have been misled or failed to apprehend fully the significance of the issue and the evidence relevant to its proper determination, and assuredly there is no case presented for reversible error. This cause, requiring much time and work, has been fully and carefully tried with the assistance of competent, alert, and diligent counsel on both sides. The determinative issues have been fairly decided, and the results of the hearing should not be disturbed unless it is reasonably made to appear that the appellant's defense has been prejudiced in some way by substantial error."

And State v. Standcll, 178 N. C. 683, 100 S. E. 241, Griffin v. Railroad, 138 N. C. 55, 50 S. E. 516, West v. Grocery Co., 138 N. C. 166, 50 S. E. 565, and many other well-considered decisions with us are to like effect. And, if the statement of the witness is to be taken as having significance, it is to my mind clearly competent, and in no event should it be excluded on the ground advanced in the decision of the court "that it is an opinion on a fact directly involved in the issue." This position that opinion evidence otherwise competent must be excluded for the reasons suggested has to my mind been very much overworked in some of the decisions in the American courts, and with the result that both courts and juries have been deprived of much proper and helpful evidence in the trial of causes before them. As applied in these cases, the doctrine has been criticized by intelligent writers on the law of evidence and disapproved in the more recent and better considered decisions on the subject. 3 Wigmore on Evidence, §§ 1919, 1920. And accordingly in my judgment it is now the approved principle that on relevant facts properly established and on "questions of science and skill opinions may be received from persons specially instructed by study and experience in the particular art or mystery to which the investigation relates." And on pertinent facts coming under their personal observation witnesses who are not in strictness scientific experts may give an opinion relevant to the issue when they are shown to be qualified by training, and experience to so aid the jury in coming to a correct conclusion. Caton v. Toler, 160 N. C. 104, 75 S. E. 929; Tire Co. v. Whitehurst, 148 N. C. 446, 62 S. E. 523; Hardy v. Merrill, 56 N. H. 227-241, 22 Am. Rep. 441; McKelvey on Evidence, pp. 230, 231; 1 Elliott, § 675. In many cases the opinion or estimate or mental inference of such a witness based upon such facts is the only way that the evidence can be properly presented, and in such instances, when otherwise competent, it should not be excluded merely because it may be on a fact directly involved in the issue. And our more recent decisions are in full approval and illustration of the principle as stated. Thus in Britt v. Railroad, 148 N. C. 37, 61 S. E. 601, question of negligence by an employer in not supplying chains of sufficient strength to pull heavy logs into a car, a witness taking part and having personal knowledge and observation of conditions was allowed to state "that a double chain would have been safer than the single one the employees were using."

In Hux v. Reflector Co., 173 N. C. 97, 91 S. E. 591, suit by employee for negligent injury in supplying a defective printing press, as a witness, "plaintiff was allowed to state that the press was out of date, old, and worn."

In Renn v. Railroad, 170 N. C. 128-141, 86 S. E. 964, 970, action for negligence in affording improper place for employee to do his work by which he stepped on the ice and was severely injured, on the question of contributory negligence witness was asked:

"Did you cause your own fall in any way? A. No; I did not; I was just as careful walking as I could be."

In disallowing defendant's exception Associate Justice Allen in his opinion said:

"Phifer v. R. R., 122 N. C. 940, is authority for the position that the latter part of the answer is objectionable as an expression of opinion, but the later cases and the trend of authority elsewhere are that it is competent as a statement of a fact. Taylor v. Security Co., 145 N. C. 885; Britt v. R. R., 148 N. C. 40; State v. Leak, 156 N. C. 647; 3 Wig. Ev. § 1938; McKelvey, Ev. § 220"

—and quoted with approval from Prof. Wigmore, vol. 3, § 1949, as follows:

"This topic is one of the few upon which there has never existed in the English precedents any foundation for doubt. The subject of the testimony in question is manifold; sometimes it is whether proper care was taken, sometimes whether action was reasonable, sometimes whether sufficient skill was shown, sometimes whether a place or a machine was safe; but all the forms seem reducible to a general one, namely, whether a certain standard of conduct was observed. Looking first at the orthodox practice in England, it is clear there is not, and never has been, any real question as to the propriety of such testimony. The morbid and doctrinaire theory of cautiousness which is the foundation of the American rulings has never been known at the English bar."

He speaks of the rule of the exclusion as a "modern excrescence on the common law" and concludes that such evidence is competent.

In the present instance the witness was an experienced electrician who spoke from personal observation of the relevant conditions presented. He saw that plaintiff in climbing the pole had to pass the traction wires of one of the defendants and attach the telephone wires to the poles, doing his work just above the traction wires. He saw that these traction wires carrying a heavy voltage were exposed just below the pole where they ran through a sycamore tree, and affording conditions that rendered contact between two sets of wires highly probable. He saw conditions that threatened immediately on the other side of the pole where plaintiff was working and received his injury, and with these facts in his possession it was strictly within line of correct principles and directly in accord with our decided cases that this witness was allowed to testify that the conditions presented and personally observed by him were not safe. In my opinion as stated, the testimony was clearly competent, and, if otherwise, it should be disregarded as not amounting to reversible error.

(181 N. C. 321)

LOGGINS v. SOUTHERN PUBLIC UTILITIES CO. et al. (No. 359.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 20, 1921.)

1. Trial \Leftrightarrow 165—Evidence considered most strongly for plaintiff on motion for nonsuit.

On motion for nonsuit, the evidence must be considered most strongly in favor of the plaintiff.

2. Carriers \Leftrightarrow 320(2)—Whether boy, when struck by automobile after having descended from street car, was a passenger, held for the jury.

In action for death of boy struck by automobile after having descended from a street car and taken one step at transfer point, where he was to have transferred to another car of defendant railroad on transfer ticket given him as a passenger on the car on which he had been riding, after he had once before descended from such car and had re-entered car to get basket he had left therein, whether he was a passenger at time of his death held for the jury.

3. Carriers \Leftrightarrow 247(4)—Rule as to when "passenger" loses his status as such stated.

A passenger on alighting from a street car at the end of his journey loses his status as a passenger when he has stepped from the car to a place of safety on the street or on the highway, the question depending, not on number of steps he has taken, but on the circumstances and conditions under which he alights.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Passenger.]

4. Carriers \Leftrightarrow 303(1)—Street car passenger entitled to be safely discharged.

Street car passenger is entitled to be discharged in a proper manner and at a time and place reasonably safe for that purpose.

5. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 997(2)—Conflicting testimony or credibility of witnesses not considered on appeal from nonsuit.

The Supreme Court, when considering a judgment of nonsuit, will not pass upon conflicting testimony and consider its credibility, but will limit its inquiry to the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant a verdict for the plaintiff; a credibility of the testimony being exclusively for the jury.

Walker and Allen, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Webb, Judge.

Action by L. A. Loggins, administrator, against the Southern Public Utilities Company and others. From judgment of nonsuit as to the named defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Civil action to recover damages for an alleged negligent injury and killing of plaintiff's intestate, a boy between eight and nine years of age.

There was evidence for the plaintiff, tending to show that on July 10, 1919, L. A. Loggins, a carpenter, and his infant son, took passage on a street car of the Southern Public Utilities Company, near Twenty-Third street in the city of Winston-Salem and paid their fares to East Winston where plaintiff lived. In order to make this continuous trip, over the defendant's lines, it was necessary to ride down Liberty street in said city, to a point near its intersection with Fourth street, and there to transfer to another car bound for East Winston.

Before reaching this regular transfer point, the conductor gave the plaintiff and his son transfer tickets which were to be used on the East Winston car as soon as it reached the junction. They left the initial car at the usual stopping place, which is in "the center of the business part of town, where passengers ordinarily transfer from one car to another, and there is a great deal of traffic and congestion about this corner."

The father had his arms and pockets full of carpenter's tools and was carrying some tools on his shoulder. Just as he reached the sidewalk, the boy being several feet from the curbing out in the street, he remarked: "Son, where is our basket?" The basket, containing their lunch, had been left on the car. Almost instantly, the boy turned and ran back into the street car to get the basket. He entered at the front door, and the motorman closed the door behind him. After finding the basket, he came back to the front platform. The motorman then opened the door to let the boy out, and just as he stepped off the car to the street an automobile driven by Louisa Holland ran over him and killed him. The boy "turned as he stepped off in the street and his back was to the automobile. He turned and she hit him. People were getting off and on the street car at the back end at the time she passed. The automobile ran over him just as he got off the car and got one step."

At the close of plaintiff's evidence, defendant moved for judgment of nonsuit as to the Southern Public Utilities Company, which motion was allowed. Plaintiff appealed.

J. C. Wallace and Raymond G. Parker, both of Winston-Salem, for appellant.

Manly, Hendren & Womble and Swink, Korner & Hutchins, all of Winston-Salem, for appellee Southern Public Utilities Co.

STACY, J. [1, 2] Considering the evidence most strongly in favor of the plaintiff, which we are required to do on a motion to nonsuit, we think it sufficient to carry the case to the jury.

The following may be stated as reasonable inferences from the testimony appearing in the record:

(1) Plaintiff's intestate, a boy under nine-years of age, was a passenger on one of the street cars of the Southern Public Utilities Company.

(2) In company with his father, he left this car at the usual place, for the purpose of transferring to another car which would carry them to East Winston.

(3) He had in his possession a ticket which entitled him to transfer from one car to another at this point.

(4) After leaving the car, but before reaching the sidewalk, and while passengers were still getting on and off, he returned through the front entrance to get his lunch basket, which inadvertently had been left on the car.

(5) The defendant's motorman was aware of the boy's movements and opened the door for him to disembark the second time.

(6) This happened near a corner in the center of the business part of town, where there is a great deal of traffic and congestion.

(7) Just as he stepped from the car to the street, and probably had taken one step, he was struck by an automobile and killed.

His honor granted the defendant company's motion for judgment as of nonsuit upon the theory that plaintiff's intestate was not a passenger at the time of his injury and that the defendant company owed him no affirmative duty of care.

By the clear weight of authority, the relation of passenger and carrier ordinarily ends when the passenger safely steps from a street car to the street. He then becomes a pedestrian on the public highway, and the carrier is not responsible for his safe passage from the street to the sidewalk; for once safely landed in the street, his rights as a passenger cease. Wood v. Public Service Corporation, 174 N. C. 697, 94 S. E. 459, 1 A. L. R. 942; Whitt v. Public Service Corporation, 76 N. J. Law, 729, 72 Atl. 420, 74 Atl. 568; Clark v. Traction Co., 138 N. C. 77, 50 S. E. 518, 107 Am. St. Rep. 526; Palmer v. Electric Co., 131 N. C. 250, 42 S. E. 604; Smith v. City Ry. Co., 29 Or. 539, 46 Pac. 136, 46 Pac. 780; Creamer v. West End St. Ry., 156 Mass. 320, 31 N. E. 391, 16 L. R. A. 490, 32 Am. St. Rep. 456; Keator v. Traction Co., 191 Pa. 102, 43 Atl. 86, 44 L. R. A. 546, 71 Am. St. Rep. 758; Street R. R. v. Boddy, 105 Tenn. 669, 58 S. W. 646; Oddy v. W. Street Ry. Co., 178 Mass. 341, 59 N. E. 1026, 86 Am. St. Rep. 482; Duchemin v. Boston, etc., Co., 186 Mass. 353, 71 N. E. 780, 66 L. R. A. 980, 104 Am. St. Rep. 590 and note, 1 Ann. Cas. 603.

However, the courts are not universally in accord on this subject. In Johnson v. Washington Water Power Co., 62 Wash. 619, 114 Pac. 453, it is stated:

"A passenger on alighting from a street car is more or less subject to the conditions in which the carrier has placed him, and common prudence dictates that he should have a reasonable time to note the surroundings and prepare to protect himself from the ordinary dangers of the street."

And in Louisville Ry. Co. v. Kennedy, 162 Ky. 560, 172 S. W. 970, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 996, it is said:

"When a street car stops to permit a passenger to alight, he is still a passenger until he has had a reasonable opportunity to reach a place of safety."

Again:

"It is the duty of a street car company to select a reasonably safe place for landing passengers wherever it may stop a car for that purpose." Macon Railway Co. v. Vining, 120 Ga. 511, 48 S. E. 232; and to like effect Birmingham Railway Light & Power Co. v. O'Brien, 185 Ala. 617, 64 South. 343; Welsh v. Spokane, etc., R. R. Co., 91 Wash. 260, 157 Pac. 679, L. R. A. 1916F, 484; Montgomery Street Ry. Co. v. Mason, 133 Ala. 529, 32 South. 261; and Melton v. Birmingham Ry. L. & P. Co., 153 Ala. 95, 45 South. 151, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 467.

See, also, 10 C. J., 627.

Ordinarily, a person would not step from a car to the street in the presence of imminent danger, or unless it were safe to do so; and safely landed in the street does not mean simply reaching the street with both feet and no more. The test could not be as to whether the passenger had actually left the car and reached the street without injury, but was it safe for him to do so, under the attending circumstances? Obviously, there is a difference between a safe landing and a landing in safety. The one has reference to the act of the passenger in stepping from the car to the street, the other to the condition in which he finds himself immediately after accomplishing this act.

[3, 4] We think a fair statement of the rule would be to say that a passenger, on alighting from a street car at the end of his journey, loses his status as a passenger when he has stepped from the car to a place of safety on the street, or on the highway. The question should not be made to depend entirely upon the number of steps which the passenger may take on leaving the car, but rather upon the circumstances and conditions under which he alights. He is entitled to be discharged in a proper manner and at a time and place reasonably safe for that purpose.

It is also held that the relation of passenger and carrier continues while the passenger is transferring from one street car to another, he having been furnished a ticket enabling him to do so, when such transfer is part of a continuous trip, or, at least, that he is entitled to the same degree of care as a passenger to insure his safety from injury by the operation of the same or other cars of the carrier, or from defects or negligence in the use of any of its appliances. Wilson v. Detroit United Ry., 167 Mich. 107, 132 N. W. 762; Citizens' Street Ry. Co. v. Merl, 134

Ind. 609, 33 N. E. 1014; Keator v. Traction Co., 191 Pa. 102, 43 Atl. 86, 44 L. R. A. 546, 71 Am. St. Rep. 758; Baldwin v. R. R. Co., 68 Conn. 567, 37 Atl. 418; Walger v. Ry. Co., 71 N. J. Law, 356, 59 Atl. 14.

In Clark v. Traction Co., 138 N. C. 77, 50 S. E. 518, 107 Am. St. Rep. 526, it is said:

"A person in transferring from one street car to the other is still a passenger, the transfer being but a part of the trip for the whole of which the company agrees to convey in safety."

In Walger v. Jersey City Ry. Co., supra, the plaintiff was a passenger on one of the defendant company's cars. He disembarked from this car for the purpose of transferring to another, a ticket enabling him to do so having been furnished him on the car upon which he first took passage. The place at which he alighted was the regular transfer point. After getting off the car, and as he was about to cross over to the other car, or while he was doing so, the car which he had left started to go around what is described in the case as "the loop," and its rear end struck him, knocked him down, and injured him. Plaintiff testified that the accident happened immediately after he got off the car and before he had taken a single step away from it. The court held that he was still a passenger at the time he was struck, and entitled to be regarded as such.

In Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. State, use Houser, et al., 60 Md. 449, the deceased was a passenger "with a ticket that entitled him to be carried safely from Hagerstown to Frederick. By the regular route and mode of carriage it was necessary for him to change cars at the Weyerton Station and to cross over the intervening tracks of the defendant from one train to another. In making this transit he continued to be a passenger of the defendant, and entitled to the protection that the highest degree of care on the part of the defendant could afford, under the circumstances."

It may be that this rule has been stated too broadly in some of the cases, but it would be well-nigh impossible to couch a satisfactory limitation in general terms, for as to whether a person, under a given state of facts, would be considered in law a passenger while transferring from one street car to another, although holding a transfer ticket, must be determined ultimately by the facts and circumstances attending the transfer in each particular case.

There is another line of cases in which a passenger does not lose his rights as such, under conditions somewhat different from those above stated.

In Tompkins v. Boston Elevated Ry. Co., 201 Mass. 114, 87 N. E. 488, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1063, 181 Am. St. Rep. 392, it was held that a passenger, who, on account of the crowded condition, was riding on the vestibule, or platform, of the car, did not cease to be a passenger by temporarily alighting for the purpose of permitting other passengers to get off the car more conveniently; the court saying:

"The necessity or courtesy which prompted his action did not terminate his status as passenger."

In Chicago & Eastern R. R. Co. v. Flexman, 103 Ill. 546, 42 Am. Rep. 33, it was held that where a passenger on a railroad, on arriving at his destination, missed his watch and, with the consent of the conductor, remained on the train for the purpose of looking for it until he reached another station, the company occupied the same position towards the passenger as if he had paid his fare to such other station.

In Ormond v. Hayes, 60 Tex. 180, it was held that where a passenger, upon alighting from a train, went to the baggage car for the purpose of obtaining his baggage, and there aided the servants of the carrier in removing the baggage from the car, the relation of passenger and carrier did not cease by that act; he not holding a check for his baggage at the time.

In the case at bar, under all the facts and circumstances appearing on the record, we are of the opinion that plaintiff's intestate, while alighting from the car after getting his lunch basket, was entitled to be regarded as a passenger on defendant's car and still within the sphere of its protection as such. Palmer v. Electric Co., supra. We think he was within his rights, as a passenger, in immediately returning for his basket. This was done with the knowledge and consent, or at least acquiescence, of defendant's motorman. He was permitted to take the basket into the car, without objection; and, under the same conditions, he returned to get it. Had he not been a passenger, his basket would not have been on the car at all, neither would he. What really transpired was only an incident occasioned by his mode of traveling. It was not unusual or uncommon and doubtless not altogether unexpected. The agility with which he ran back into the car, after his attention had been called to the missing article, was characteristic of boyish impulses; and his youthfulness should be taken into consideration in determining the relative rights and duties of the parties.

[5] The defendant elicited on cross-examination some evidence not as favorable to the plaintiff as that stated above, but we are not permitted to pass upon conflicting testimony when considering a judgment of nonsuit. Our inquiry is directed to its sufficiency to warrant a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The jury alone may consider its credibility. Shell v. Roseman, 155 N. C. 90, 71 S. E. 86.

With the case going back for a new trial, we refrain from further comment or discus-slon, as the defendant's evidence may show a different state of facts from what now appears.

Reversed.

WALKER and ALLEN, JJ., dissenting.

DURHAM v. HAMILTON et al. (No. 395.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 20, 1921.)

1. Judgment \Leftarrow 255, 256(1)—Judgment beyond the scope of facts admitted or established by verdict is irregular, and may be absolutely invalid.

An adversary judgment, which is the conclusion of the law from the facts admitted or established by the verdict, must be within the scope and purport of the facts so ascertained, and beyond that the judgment is at best irregular, and may at times be entirely invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Judgment.]

2. Judgment \Leftarrow 256(1)—Judgment restraining maintenance of hog or cattle pens in connection with nuisance held too broad.

In an action for damages for a nuisance caused by the improper maintenance of a slaughterhouse and aggravated by the condition of hog and cattle pens used in connection therewith, a judgment after verdict for plaintiff, restraining defendants from maintaining a hog or cattle pen on the premises for use in connection with the slaughterhouse "or otherwise," was broader than the issues as determined by the verdict, and will be modified by striking therefrom the words "or otherwise."

Exceptions and Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Ray, Judge.

Civil action by P. H. Durham against T. Y. Hamilton and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants except and appeal. Modified and affirmed.

The action is to recover damages for an alleged nuisance affecting the property of plaintiff, and to restrain the further continuance of same, caused by the wrongful and improper maintenance by defendants of a slaughterhouse on a stream just above plaintiff's land, and aggravated by the condition of certain hog pens, etc., as maintained in connection with said slaughterhouse and causing damage, etc. On denial of liability, the jury rendered the following verdict:

"(1) Did the defendants erect and maintain the nuisance as alleged in the complaint?"

"Answer: Yes.

"(2) What damages, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover?"

"Answer: $600.00."

Judgment for amount of damages, and that defendants be restrained, etc.

T. W. Albertson, of High Point, and King, Sapp & King and Brooks, Hines & Kelly, all of Greensboro, for appellants.

R. C. Strudwick and Wilson & Frazier, all of Greensboro, and J. M. Hedgecock, of High Point, for appellee.

HOKIE, J. [1] We find no error in the record affecting the determination of the issues, but the judgment, in our opinion, goes farther than the verdict warrants. As applied to the facts of this record, an adversary judgment is but the conclusion of the law from the facts admitted, or as established by the verdict, and must be within the scope and purport of the facts so ascertained and determined. Beyond that, the judgment is, at best, irregular, and may, at times, be held entirely invalid. Holloway v. Durham, 176 N. C. 550, 97 S. E. 625; Hobgood v. Hobgood, 169 N. C. 491, 86 S. E. 189; Williams v. Williams, 74 N. C. 1; Whitwell v. Hoover & Emory, 3 Mich. 84, 59 Am. Dec. 220; State v. Muench, 217 Mo. 124, 117 S. W. 25, 129 Am. St. Rep. 536; 15 B. C. L. p. 569, title Judgments, § 2.

In Holloway v. Durham, supra, it is held:

"That an adversary judgment of the court upon matters beyond the scope of the pleadings, and which undertakes to settle and determine those entirely foreign to the controversy, is to that extent not binding, etc."

In State v. Muench, supra, a judgment is defined as the—"Sentence of the law upon the record; an application of the law to the facts and pleadings."

A very proper and succinct definition is given in Whitwell v. Hoover & Emory, 3 Mich. 84, 59 Am. Dec. 2201, supra:

"That a judgment is the final consideration and determination of a court of competent jurisdiction upon the matters submitted to it."

And again, in the citation to B. C. Law, it is said:

"A more precise definition is that a judgment is the conclusion of the law upon the matters contained in the record, or the application of the law to the pleadings and the facts as found by the court, or admitted by the parties, or deemed to exist upon their default in a course of judicial proceedings."

[2] On the present record, after awarding a recovery for the damages suffered, and that the further maintenance of the nuisance be restrained, the judgment proceeds as follows:

"And defendants are further ordered and directed not to use or maintain, or permit the use and maintenance on said premises, of any hog pen or cattle pen for use, in connection with said slaughterhouse, or otherwise."

The condition and manner of conducting the hog pens and cattle pens "in connection with the slaughterhouse" were very clearly shown to be a part of the nuisance, and in great aggravation of the injury, and were properly prohibited; but in extending this prohibition by the term "or otherwise," this might very well be construed and operate to prevent the defendants from using their property in the respects suggested, as required by the course of good husbandry, and in a way entirely harmless to plaintiff. To that extent we think the judgment is unauthorized by the facts established, and same should be modified by striking out the words "or otherwise." With this modification, the judgment is affirmed.

Modified and affirmed.

(181 N. C. 218)

COMBS, Adm'x, v. JEFFERSON STANDARD LIFE INS. CO. (No. 330.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 20, 1921.)

1. Insurance — 380—Facts constituting fraud in procuring lapsing of life policy.

Where insurance agent falsely represented to insured, a farmer ignorant of business of life insurance, that his policy had lapsed, and, relying thereon, insured failed to pay premiums for several years, his beneficiary on his death was entitled to recover; the insured, upon ascertaining that he had been imposed upon, immediately instituting suit for reinstatement, but dying before case was brought to trial.

2. Insurance — 380—Life company cannot retain benefit of fraudulent representation of agent that policy had lapsed.

In an action on a life policy, where plaintiff claimed that lapsing of policy sued on was procured by fraud and misrepresentation of agent, court properly instructed: "If the jury find by the preponderance of the evidence that W., as agent of the defendant, procured the lapsing of the policy by fraud and false representations, then the defendant company cannot retain the benefit of such conduct of W. and be relieved from the consequences of such fraudulent means by which such lapsing was obtained."

Exceptions and Appeal from Superior Court, Alamance County; Allen, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Anne Combs, as administratrix of the estate of A. L. Combs, deceased, against the Jefferson Standard Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant excepts and appeals. No error.

Plaintiff sued on an insurance policy of $3,000 held in defendant company at the time of his death, claiming that the failure to pay the two last premiums thereon was caused by false and fraudulent representations of the defendant's agent having charge of the matter. Defendant denied liability, and alleged that policy was forfeited for failure to pay premiums due thereon; that, if any representations were made by their agent, it was after the absolute forfeiture of policies, and agent in question was without authority in the premises. The jury rendered the following verdict:

"(1) Was the lapsing of the policy sued on procured by fraud and misrepresentation as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(2) If said representations were made were the same made prior to January 1, 1918—that is, before that time? Answer: Yes."

Judgment for plaintiff for amount of policy less unpaid premiums.

Brooks, Hines & Kelly, of Greensboro, for appellant.

J. J. Henderson, of Graham, and W. P. Bynum and R. C. Strudwick, both of Greensboro, for appellee.

HOKE, J. There were facts in evidence on the part of plaintiff tending to show that in 1915 plaintiff's intestate had taken out a policy in defendant company for $3,000 at an annual premium of $106.32, payable December 1, of each year, and with an extension privilege of 30 days; the first premium becoming due in 1915; that the policy was pledged to the company as collateral for a loan of money which had been paid off when due; the company still retaining possession of the policy; that the premiums for 1915 and 1916 were duly paid by intestate, and in 1917, the latter part of November or in December of said year, an agent of defendant company came to the home of the intestate, reminded him that his premium would soon be due or was already due, and urged the intestate not to allow the policy to lapse; that intestate in the conversation told the agent that he had developed a case of tuberculosis, and there was doubt if he could keep up the policy, etc.; thereupon the agent immediately changed position and told the intestate that he had pledged the policy to the company as security, and that the same had lapsed and become void on payment of said loan, and company would accept no more premiums on it; that the intestate was a farmer, ignorant of business of this kind, and especially of the business of life insurance; that the health of intestate had been failing for some months and was rapidly growing worse, and "his fatal malady was such as to seriously affect his nervous system, rendering him despondent, impairing his capacity for work or resisting importunity," and under the conditions presented, believing representations of agent to be true, and that the policy was no longer in force, he failed to pay the premiums for 1917-1918; that intestate was at all times ready and willing to pay said premiums, and, as soon as he ascertained that he had been imposed upon by the false and fraudulent representation of defendant's agent, he instituted suit against the company for reinstatement, etc., but died in the early part of 1919 before the case could be brought to a trial.

[1] There was evidence of defendant in denial of plaintiff's position and tending to show that any conversation with Mr. White, their agent was in January, 1918, after the policy had become forfeited; that said agent was without power to bind the company by any waiver or stipulations other than contained in the contract. On the pertinent issues submitted, the jury have accepted plaintiff's version of the matter and on the facts, as stated, we are of opinion that her cause of action has been properly established.

[2] It is chiefly urged for error by appellant that the court in part and on the principal issue instructed the jury as follows:

"If the jury should find by the greater weight of the evidence that V. B. White, as agent of the defendant, procured the lapsing of the policy as alleged in the complaint, which I have mentioned to you, by fraud and false representations, I say, if the jury find by the preponderance of the evidence that White, as agent of the defendant, procured the lapsing of the policy by fraud and false representations, then the defendant company cannot retain the benefit of such conduct of White and be relieved from the consequence of such fraudulent means by which such lapsing was obtained, if you find that to be the fact."

There are facts in evidence on the part of plaintiff permitting the inference that the agent, V. B. White, was within the course and scope of his authority in his conversation with intestate about keeping up the policy, but assuming, as this instruction does, that the said agent acted beyond his powers in the premises, we think the charge is in accord with the approved principles. In Tiffany on Agency, p. 46, it is said:

"That the relationship of principal and agent is created by ratification when one person adopts an act done by another person, assuming to act in his behalf, but without authority or in excess of authority with the same force and effect as if the same had been created by appointment."

The citation, as stated, is quoted as authoritative in Trollinger v. Fleer, 157 N. C. 81-87, 72 S. E. 795, and the principle has been approved and applied in numerous decisions in this and other courts dealing with the question. Bank v. Justice, 157 N. C. 373-375, 72 S. E. 1016; Osborne v. Durham, 157 N. C. 263, 72 S. E. 849; Sprunt v. May, 156 N. C. 388, 72 S. E. 821; Rudasill v. Falls, 92 N. C. 222; Reitman v. Florillo, 76 N. J. Law, 815, 72 Atl. 74; Whiting v. Crandall, 78 Mo. 593; Clough v. Dawson, 69 Or. 52, 133 Pac. 345, 138 Pac. 233; Heinlein v. Imp. Life Insurance Co., 101 Mich. 250, 59 N. W. 615, 25 L.

R. A. 627, 45 Am. St. Rep. 409; Tabor v. Michigan Mutual Life Insurance Co., 44 Mich. 324, 6 N. W. 830.

As a deduction from the primary position and more directly applicable to the facts presented it is held in the Reitman Case, supra:

"That an innocent principal cannot assert any rights or retain any benefits upon a contract when it is procured by the fraud of his agent."

And so here. The surrender of the policy having been procured by the false and fraudulent representations of V. B. White, an agent of the company, and professing to have authority in the matter, the company cannot retain the policy and repudiate the acts of the agent by which it was obtained.

There are modifications of the doctrine required, or rather a different rule prevails when one is seeking to hold an innocent principal in an action for deceit on the part of his agent, and there are other well-recognized exceptions (Kennedy v. McKay, 43 N. J. Law, 288, 39 Am. Rep. 581; 2 Corpus Juris, p. 495), but we are clearly of opinion that the present case comes well within the wholesome principle laid down by his honor, and that the judgment for plaintiff should be affirmed.

No error.

(181 N. C. 543)

STATE v. JONES. (No. 377.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 20, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §1147—Discretion in fixing punishment under statute reviewed only if grossly abused.

Where a statute leaves the punishment for its violation within the sound discretion of the trial court, the sentence imposed will not be reviewed by the Supreme Court on appeal where the exercise of such discretion has not been grossly and palpably abused.

2. Criminal law §1213 — Sentence of two years on public roads for driving automobile when intoxicated is not cruel and unusual punishment.

Under C. S. § 4506, fixing the penalty for operating an automobile while intoxicated at a fine of not less than $50 or imprisonment not less than 30 days, but fixing no maximum penalty, a sentence of two years on the public roads for that offense does not constitute cruel and unusual punishment.

3. Criminal law §93—Municipal court held not to have jurisdiction to try for driving automobile when intoxicated.

Under Laws 1909, c. 651, § 5, creating a municipal court and specifying the criminal offenses of which the court is given jurisdiction, the court has no jurisdiction over the offense of driving an automobile while intoxicated which was created since the Municipal Court Act by Laws 1919, c. 234, now C. S. § 4506, except to bind over the defendant to the superior court.

4. Criminal law ¶1144(1)—Presumed on appeal that defendant was bound over to superior court; recital of fine and appeal in bond being surplusage.

Where a defendant, charged with an offense in the municipal court over which that court did not have jurisdiction, gave bond to appear and answer the charge in the superior court, it will be presumed on appeal that he was merely bound over by the municipal court to the superior court, and the recital that he had been fined and had appealed is mere surplusage.

5. Indictment and information ¶5—Plea of guilty waives indictment.

Under C. S. § 4610, expressly authorizing waiver of indictment as to a misdemeanor which does not contain the element of fraud, deceit, or malice, a plea of guilty to charge of operating automobile while intoxicated waives the indictment.

6. Indictment and information ¶2(4)—Right to charge formulated by grand jury can be waived.

In view of Const. art. 4, § 13, authorizing the waiver of a trial by jury in all issues of fact joined in any court, accused can waive the lesser requirement of the charge being formulated by grand jury, and C. S. § 4610, authorizing such waiver in specified cases, is a restriction upon the unlimited right theretofore exercised of waiving an indictment.

7. Indictment and information ¶1—Indictment unnecessary on appeal from sentence in municipal court.

An indictment in the circuit court is not necessary where defendant, convicted in the municipal court of an offense over which that court had jurisdiction, appealed to the circuit court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Ray, Judge.

Charlie Jones was arrested upon a warrant issued from the municipal court of Greensboro to answer the charge of operating an automobile while intoxicated. He was found guilty and appealed and was bound over to the superior court to answer the charge. At the December term of the superior court of Guilford, the defendant in open court, through his counsel, entered a plea of guilty, and the judgment was pronounced. The defendant appealed; assigning as error that the sentence of two years on the public roads was cruel and excessive punishment. Affirmed.

S. B. Adams, R. C. Strudwick, and C. C. Frazier, all of Greensboro, for appellant.

The Attorney General and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLARK, C. J. [1] The only assignment of error is that the punishment was cruel and unusual, and this is the only proposition set out in the brief for the state and in the brief for the defendant. That point has been recently reviewed and held adversely to the contention of the defendant in State v. Woodlief, 172 N. C. 885, 90 S. E. 137, where it was held:

"Where a statute leaves the punishment for its violation within the sound discretion of the trial court, the sentence imposed by him will not be reviewed by this court on appeal where its exercise has not been grossly or palpably abused."

And there is nothing in the record which tends to show that such was the case.

[2] The statute (C. S. 4506) provides:

"Any person who shall while intoxicated or under the influence of intoxicating liquors or bitters, morphine or other opiates, operate an automobile upon the public highways of any county or the streets of any city or town in this state, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $50 or imprisoned not less than 30 days, or both, at the discretion of the court."

The offense is a most serious one, and in the judgment of the General Assembly it was necessary to enact this provision for the protection of the public from the dangers incident to the operation of powerful and rapidly moving automobiles operated by persons in the condition denounced in the statute. The penalty was intended to be sufficient to deter from the commission of the crime, and the limitation prescribed a minimum, and not a maximum, punishment. The assignment of error cannot be sustained upon anything that appears in this record.

[3] At the hearing here an exception was taken for the first time that the defendant could not be punished in excess of the jurisdiction of the municipal court because no bill had been found, but this exception, if it could be taken orally, without assignment in the record, cannot be sustained. The statute creating the municipal court of Greensboro (Laws 1909, c. 651, § 5), prescribing the criminal jurisdiction of that court, specifies the criminal offenses of which it is given jurisdiction, none of which includes this offense, which indeed was not then created; the offense having been created since by Laws 1919, c. 234, now C. S. 4506. From this it is clear that such court had no jurisdiction of this offense except to bind over the defendant to the superior court, which was done, and the defendant gave bond to appear at that court and "answer this charge."

[4] The bond is not set out in the record, but it is to be presumed that the defendant was bound over, reciting that he had been fined and appealed, but his bond was to "appear and answer the charge in the superior court," and the recital of the appeal, if made, was mere surplusage, as the municipal court had no jurisdiction to do more than bind him over, and the trial in that court was a nullity.

[5] When the defendant, bound over to the superior court to answer this charge, in open court pleaded guilty, he waived the indictment. The waiver of the bill of indictment is expressly authorized by Laws 1907, c. 71, now C. S. 4610, as to "a misdemeanor which does not include or contain the element of fraud, deceit or malice," and it was entered "upon a plea of guilty" and "with the consent of the defendant's counsel."

[6] The Constitution (article 4, § 13) authorizes the waiver of a trial by jury "in all issues of fact, joined in any court." If a petty jury can be waived, of course the lesser requirement of the charge being formulated by grand jury could be waived, and C. S. 4610, is on its face a restriction upon the unlimited right, theretofore more freely exercised of waiving an indictment.

[7] On the other hand, if the recorder's court possessed the jurisdiction to render final judgment notwithstanding C. S. 1567 (last clause therein), upon appeal no indictment was necessary. This was held in State v. Jones, 145 N. C. 460, 59 S. E. 117, citing State v. Lytle, 138 N. C. 746, 51 S. E. 66, upon an appeal from the recorder's court of Winston where it was held:

"In the superior court, upon appeal from a conviction for a petty misdemeanor, indictment by grand jury is dispensed with."

In State v. Jones, 145 N. C. 460, 59 S. E. 117, it is said:

"In like manner, when a case is tried in superior court on appeal from a justice of the peace, no indictment is required. State v. Quick, 72 N. C. 243; State v. Thornton, 136 N. C. 616."

To same purport State v. Crook, 91 N. C. 540, and the reason is nowhere better given than by Judge Merrimon in that case and by Judge Reade in State v. Quick, supra, 72 N. C. 241. Whether the recorder had jurisdiction or not, the sentence appealed from is authorized by the statute and valid.

When the defendant in pursuance of the terms of his bond appeared in open court and with the consent of his counsel pleaded guilty, this was a waiver of indictment for an original offense in that court under the terms of C. S. 4610, and, if he appeared to answer the charge upon appeal, no indictment was necessary upon the authorities above cited. In either event, when the defendant pleaded guilty, there was no issue requiring a petty jury and still less any requirement of indictment. Why do an unnecessary act? In State v. Koonce, 108 N. C. 754, 12 S. E. 1032, Merrimon, C. J., said:

"If [the defendant] pleaded nolo contendere, or guilty, the court might have proceeded to give judgment."

In State v. Warren, 113 N. C. 683, 78 S. E. 466, the court held that, "where a defendant pleads guilty, his appeal from a judgment thereon cannot call into question the facts charged nor the regularity and correctness of the proceedings," but only brings up for review whether the judgment is legal upon the charge admitted, and accordingly in this case the sole assignment of error is that the sentence is excessive punishment, forbidden by the Constitution.

Judgment affirmed.

(181 N. C. 234)

BRADY v. HUGHES, Sheriff. (No. 398.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 20, 1921.)

1. Sheriffs and constables ⇐104—Giving debt or opportunity to escape does not constitute "escape," making sheriff liable.

The mere giving one under arrest for debt a chance to escape does not constitute voluntarily or negligently permitting an escape within the meaning of C. St. § 3943, making the sheriff liable for debt, interest, and costs; for such statute, being highly penal, requires strict construction.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, use Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Escape.]

2. Sheriffs and constables ⇐104—Prisoner for debt not allowed to go at large held not to have "escaped."

Revisal 1906, § 627, does not require a debtor to be kept in close confinement, as did the former statute, and where debtor was under surveillance and restraint all the time until delivered to the sheriff, and was not permitted to and did not attempt to go at large, the sheriff is not liable for the debt for permitting an escape under C. S. § 3943, because the giving of a mere opportunity to escape does not constitute an escape, which consists of gaining liberty before being delivered in due course of law.

3. Sheriffs and constables ⇐104—Voluntary and willful escape of prisoner for debt not shown so as to render sheriff liable.

If it be conceded that facts show negligent escape, where the debtor was immediately retaken and imprisoned, that could be pleaded in bar of a suit for the penalty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Ray, Judge.

Action by Vance Brady against J. R. Hughes, Sheriff of Randolph County. The court sustained defendant's demurrer, and plaintiff appeals. No error.

Plaintiff's cause of action, briefly stated, is that defendant, sheriff of Randolph county, through one of his deputies, arrested one Robert Needham, under an execution against the person regularly issued from the superior court of Guilford county to Randolph county, in an action entitled "Vance Brady v. Robert Needham"; that after making the arrest the sheriff, by his deputy, brought the defendant in execution to Greensboro, and upon his arrival took him to the office of his (Needham's) counsel, where he (the deputy) left him for a few minutes in charge of his said counsel, so that he could attend to another matter connected with the case. The deputy sheriff returned to the office, where his prisoner remained during his absence, and took him to the jail and delivered him to the sheriff of Guilford county, according to the mandate of the writ, who confined him in prison until he was duly discharged by law.

W. P. Bynum and R. C. Strudwick, both of Greensboro, for appellant.

Brooks, Hines & Kelley, of Greensboro, for appellee.

WALKER, J. [1] It appears in this case that the prisoner was not permitted, voluntarily or negligently, to go at large, nor in fact did he go at large. He had the opportunity, perhaps, to do so, but the mere chance to do so will not constitute an escape within the meaning of our statute (Revisal, § 2823 [Consol. Statutes, § 3943]), making the sheriff liable for the debt, interest, and costs. The statute is highly penal, which would require it to receive a strict construction, or at least the construction of it should be a reasonable one in determining liability in any given case.

[2] There was no actual escape by the defendant. He did nothing himself, but at all times continued obedient to the direction and control of the deputy sheriff, who had him in custody. An escape is said by this court to take place "when one who is arrested gains his liberty before he is delivered in due course of law," or "the departure of a prisoner from custody." State v. Ritchie, 107 N. C. 857, 12 S. E. 251, opinion by the present Chief Justice. These definitions, as there said, were approved by Chief Justice Smith in State v. Johnson, 94 N. C. 924. If we test the question now being considered by either one of these definitions, there was in law no escape by the defendant, and none imputable to the officer in whose custody he was at the time. The defendant was not left in charge of the attorneys in their office at his own request, nor was any favor or liberty intended to be granted to him, but what was done by the officer was something incidental to the execution of the process and in the line of his duty. The defendant remained in custody and under restraint, and it may be fairly inferred from the admitted facts that the restraint was really more effectual than it was when he was in the actual custody of the officer. The latter was absent only a few moments, and the defendant, during this very brief interval, acknowledged the control and authority of the deputy sheriff, and never once attempted to evade it, or even to question it, if he ever, for a single moment, contemplated flight. Everything was fully accomplished as the law intended, and with the full consent and submission of the defendant to the law. He was taken to the jail of Guilford county, according to the mandate of the writ, and there delivered into the custody of the sheriff, who imprisoned him until he was discharged in due course of law. How has plaintiff lost a penny, or how was he in jeopardy of losing one? The execution and statute required the officer "to arrest the debtor, and commit him to the jail of the (proper) county until he shall pay the judgment or be discharged according to law." This has been done in exact conformity to the statute, and without the least prejudice to the rights of the plaintiff. We cannot believe that the law is so rigorous as to require that we should adopt the view taken of the case by the plaintiff.

But we find high authority for the support of our position in Currie v. Worthy, 47 N. C. 104. That was a case where a defendant was confined in "the debtor's room" of the jail, and was left by the jailer with the doors of the room and jail open, so that nothing prevented his escape. The court made several comments upon the evidence, which we will not quote literally, but reproduce substantially and without regard to the text, as some reference to them is necessary to a full and proper understanding of the decision. The court said that the impression of two or three witnesses that they saw Currie step from his room into the jailer's room and then back into his own room is not a fact that can be dealt with by a court. It is to be taken, therefore, that his honor was of the opinion that, if a debtor is allowed to see company in the debtor's room, the door being open and the jailer not present, or to be in the room alone with the door closed, but not locked, or to have the door of the room left open, so that nothing prevented the debtor's escape, if he desired to leave the jail, it is, in law, an escape, although the debtor does not in fact leave or go out of the debtor's room. Justice Pearson then refers to the statute of 13 Edw. I, c. 1, it being like our act (Revisal of 1905, § 2823; Consol. Statutes, § 3943), and says the act of 1795 requires that the jails of the several counties shall have an apartment for the confinement of debtors. A debtor who is not allowed to go out of this apartment and to take the benefit of prison bounds is said to be a "close prisoner." The statute, 13 Ed. I, c. 1 (Revised Statutes, c. 109, § 20), gives the creditor an action of debt against a sheriff who shall willfully and negligently suffer a debtor to escape. Our question is: What amounts to an escape, in the meaning of this statute? The acceptance of the term is "to get away from, to go out of, a place of, confinement": and in the declaration under this statute the allegation is, "and the said defendant, on," etc., "at," etc., "suffered and permitted the said E. F., to escape and go at large; and the said E. F. did then and there escape and go at large, wheresoever he would, out of the custody of the said defendant." See form, volume 2, Chitty on Plead. 418, another form, 420, and another, 422. See a like form, Jones v. Pope, 1 Saunders' Reports, 35. In this connection he says that the attention of the court was called to Wilkes v. Slaughter, 10 N. C. 211, as the authority upon which the erroneous ruling of the superior court in Currie v. Worthy was based. He criticizes that case and virtually overrules it, and adopts the view of the dissenting judge. In doing so he says:

The court lays "peculiar stress upon the fact that the jailer had given the debtor the key of his room, so as to make the debtor his own keeper. Possibly this might furnish some ground for distinguishing that from the case now under consideration. The distinction is not substantial enough to be made the ground of a practical difference. For this reason, we prefer to put our decision on the ground that we do not concur with the two judges who decided that case, and do not admit the correctness of the doctrine of 'constructive escapes' as at all applicable to the statute under which the present action is brought. Besides the fact that the authority of that case is weakened by the dissenting opinion of the Chief Justice, the decision is inconsistent with every precedent of a declaration under the statute of Ed. I, to be met with in the books. They all contain an express allegation that the 'debtor did escape and go at large.' See precedents cited above. In all the precedents of pleas of 'fresh pursuit and recaption' it is assumed that the debtor had gone out of the jail. We are told by Lord Coke: 'One of the best arguments, or proofs, in law, is drawn from the right entries in course of pleading; for the law itself speaketh by good pleading; therefore Littleton here sayeth, "it is proved by pleading," etc., as if pleading were ipsius legis viva vox.' Code Lit. 115b. We think 'it is proved by pleading' that no constructive escape can make a sheriff liable to the penalty imposed by the act, Ed. 1st. Upon an examination of the cases relied on by" the court in that case, "we find there is not any one case cited in which the debtor had not in fact 'left the jail and gone at large'; and we are satisfied that the two very learned judges were misled by the 'cunning and curious learning' which they met with in Plowden, applicable to the state of the ancient law."

The court then considers the question more nearly analogous to the one upon which this case must turn, and says:

"How it can be said that a debtor 'did escape and go at large,' when, in point of fact, he never went out of the room in which it was the duty of the sheriff to keep him, is beyond the reach of our comprehension. We know of no rule in the construction of a statute which subjects the sheriff to the payment 'of all such sums of money as are mentioned in the said execution and damages for detaining the same,' as a penalty for suffering a debtor to escape, by which we are at liberty to hold that an opportunity to go out of the debtor's room is the same, in legal effect, as if the debtor had, in fact, gone out of the room."

It will be seen that the court in that case emphasized the fact that the prisoner was not permitted "to go at large," either willfully, voluntarily, or negligently, nor given perfect freedom of action, and that he did not actually escape, though given full and free opportunity to do so. The former statute required that the debtor should be kept in the prison and in close confinement, while the present statute has no such provision, but requires only that he be committed to the jail of the county until he shall pay the judgment or be lawfully discharged. Revisal, § 627. Under the former statute requiring "close confinement," this court held that leaving the debtor in his room, with the doors of the prison open to him, during the absence of the jailer, was not an escape on the part of the latter. In this case the debtor was under surveillance and restraint all the time until he was delivered to the sheriff of Guilford county, and was not at any time permitted "to go at large," nor did he attempt to do so. We cannot, therefore, believe that a case such as this one was within the intention of the Legislature, or within the meaning of the statute.

[3] If we should concede that the facts show a negligent escape, the debtor was immediately retaken and imprisoned, as plaintiff's counsel admitted could be done, when the escape was merely negligent, and that it could be pleaded in bar of a suit for the penalty. It surely cannot be characterized as a voluntary or willful escape. No one can complain of a second arrest or recapture but the party himself. Ames v. Webbers, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 545.

It is best always for sheriffs and other such officers to follow strictly the mandates of their writs, but here, if there was any departure, it was formal, and not substantial, and not the least prejudice to the plaintiff resulted from it, but he got everything to which the law entitled him. It would be a reproach to the law if upon so slight a ground, if any ground at all, we should hold the defendant to the payment of so heavy a penalty.

Even the most technical refinement would fail to bring the case within the language of our statute.

No error.

UNION GUANO CO. v. MIDDLESEX SUPPLY CO. (No. 355.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 13, 1921.)

Process \Rightarrow 128—Statute making summons in superior court returnable before clerk does not apply to Forsyth county court.

C. S. §§ 476, 506, 509, restoring the original procedure, in effect previous to the so-called "Batchelor Act," whereby summons in the superior court was made returnable before the clerk in order to expedite business, has no application to the county court of Forsyth, created by Pub. Loc. Laws 1915, c. 520, wherein summons is returnable to the first term after service, particularly in view of C. S. § 8106, prohibiting the provisions of the compilation being held to repeal public local statutes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Finley, Judge.

Action by the Union Guano Company against the Middlesex Supply Company. Judgment by default final for plaintiff. Motion to set aside denied, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The action was begun February 4, 1920, and the summons was served February 9, returnable to the February term of said court which convened February 23. The complaint, duly verified, was filed February 4, and on February 12, three days after service of the summons, the president of the defendant company came to Winston for the purpose of making compromise with the officials of the plaintiff company; but, his offer of 50 per cent, not being accepted, he wrote a letter which appears in the record and was received by the plaintiff February 20, three days before the court convened, in which he agreed to send a check for the full amount on his return home. The following day the defendant's counsel wrote the plaintiff's counsel a letter which was received on the day court met, and in reply the plaintiff's counsel notified the defendant that, if the answer was not filed during the term, judgment by default on the verified complaint would be demanded. The answer was not filed, and the court did not extend the time to file the answer. On the last day of the term and just before the adjournment of the court, judgment by default final, as appears in the record, was signed. The defendant at the next term of said court moved to set aside the judgment upon two grounds:

(1) For excusable neglect under C. S. 600. The court held that there was no evidence of excusable neglect.

(2) Upon the ground that Laws 1919, chapters 156, 277, and 304, C. S. 476, applied to the county court of Forsyth, and that, the summons in this case not having been made returnable in accordance with said statutes, the judgment based thereon was void. Judge Starbuck refused the motion on this ground also. On appeal to the superior court, this judgment was affirmed, and the defendant appealed to this court.

Hastings & Whicker and E. F. Cullom, all of Winston-Salem, for appellant.

Swink, Korner & Hutchins, of Winston-Salem, for appellee.

OLARK, C. J. It was properly held that there was no evidence to justify setting aside the judgment on the ground of excusable neglect. The only question presented is on the second ground as to the service of the summons.

C. S. 476, requiring the summons to be served within 20 days, upon its face applies only to summonses "signed by the clerk of the superior court having jurisdiction to try the action." The county court of Forsyth was created by Public Local Laws of 1915, chapter 520.

The county of Forsyth was and is in the Eleventh judicial district, one of the largest in the state, and the judges presiding in that district are assigned 48 weeks of court out of the 52. Forsyth county is one of the most populous counties in the state, having in it the largest city in the state, and is allowed only 19 weeks in the superior court. The pressure of business was so serious, and it appears that the docket had become so congested, that a litigant was fortunate to have his cause tried under three or four years. At the instance of the bar and the people of that county, the Forsyth county court was created in 1915, with an exclusive jurisdiction in contract and tort up to $1,000, concurrent, however, with the justice of the peace to the limit of their jurisdiction. Since that time the jurisdiction of the court in contract and tort has been extended to $2,000. Section 4 provides for a term of that court once every month and oftener if the judge shall find it necessary to convene an extra term. Section 7 provides:

"That all actions shall be commenced in said court by summons, running in the name of the state and issued by the clerk of [said] court, returnable to the first term after service: Provided, the service shall be had in ten days before such term."

In section 9 it is provided that process of the court, while exercising jurisdiction which is concurrent with that of the justice of the peace, shall not run outside of Forsyth county, but, "in all other cases its process shall run as process issuing out of the superior court," which evidently merely authorizes service, in such cases, outside the county.

The defendant's contention is that the words, "in other cases, its process shall run as process issuing out of the superior court," means that the subsequent Act of 1919, now C. S. 476, restoring the former system of civil procedure by which summonses in the superior court were again made returnable before the clerk, applies also to the county court of Forsyth, especially because section 11 of the act creating this court authorizes rules of practice and section 17 provides that—

"The procedure of Forsyth county court, except that hereinbefore provided, shall follow the rules and principles laid down in the chapter on Civil Procedure in the Revisal * * * in so far as the same may be adapted to the needs and requirements of the said Forsyth county court."

The Public Local Act creating the county court of Forsyth provides that its process shall be made returnable to the terms of the court, and the restoration of the procedure in the superior court to conform to the original Code of Procedure, by which process in the superior court is made returnable before the clerk, by its terms has no reference to any other process except summonses signed by the clerk of the superior court. The statute, chapter 304, Laws 1919 (now C. S. 476) provides:

"The summons in all civil actions in the superior court shall be made returnable before the clerk at a date named therein."

Besides, C. S. 8106, especially provides:

"The Consolidated Statutes shall not have the effect to repeal any public local statute, any public statute which effects only a particular locality," etc.

Nor is there anything in the history of the legislation restoring the original provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure as to the service of summons which requires its application to any summons other than those in the superior court. Campbell v. Campbell, 179 N. C. at page 416, 102 S. E. 737. Many people in this state were very much involved pecuniarily as one of the results of the great Civil War and instead of expediting, at that time, the decision of litigation, there was a general desire to delay judgments in civil cases, and consequently what is known as the "Batchelor Act" (Laws 1868-69, c. 76) was passed by which summonses were made returnable to the terms of the court. This continued until the congestion of business in the superior courts became so serious that the "Crisp Act" of 1919, now C. S. 476, 505, 509, etc., was enacted restoring the original procedure by which summonses in the superior court was made returnable before the clerk in order to expedite business.

There is nothing in the language of that statute which extends it beyond the superior court, and in addition to C. S. 8106, prohibiting the provisions of the O. S. being held to repeal public local statutes, the mischief to be remedied does not justify such extension by judicial construction unless clearly expressed.

As county courts of Forsyth are held 12 times a year and oftener, the summons in those courts are served much more promptly and business is greatly expedited by the procedure there in force. Consequently there was no delay which required expediting the return of process as in the superior court, and indeed the application of that statute to the county court of Forsyth, instead of expediting, would retard and delay in many instances the procedure in that court.

The experience of the bar and the people with the county court of Forsyth, operating in one of the most populous counties, including as it does the largest city in the state under its efficient and able presiding officer, has been so satisfactory that no amendment has been asked in the statute creating that court and there has been no legislation which requires the application of the general statute in regard to service of processes in the superior court to the county court of Forsyth.

We therefore think that the judgment of that court was properly affirmed on appeal by Judge Finley in holding that the service of process in this case was regularly made and that there was no ground upon which the judgment by default could be set aside as irregular.

Affirmed.

STATE v. JESSUP. (No. 407.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 27, 1921.)

Criminal law §508(3)—Testimony by coindictor as to intent held wrongfully excluded.

In a prosecution for the theft of an automobile, it was error to exclude the testimony of one indicted jointly with defendant as to his knowledge that the automobile had been stolen, where it appeared that the defense of such coindictor was that in taking the alleged stolen car he mistook it for a car of the same model belonging to his brother-in-law which he was instructed to take.

Appeal from Superior Court, Richmond County; Ray, Judge.

Dennis Jessup was convicted of larceny, and appeals. New trial.

The defendant was indicted jointly with one Maner for the larceny of a Ford automobile, the property of one H. H. Anderson, and there was a count for receiving. The plea was not guilty. On the trial the defendant, in order to show that he had no felonious intent and really did not steal the car, proposed to inquire of the defendant Maner, who was a witness in his own behalf, as to any knowledge he had that the Ford car had been stolen, and the evidence was excluded, the defendant noting an exception. There was evidence that on a Saturday night Maner, Jessup, and Shaw drove from Fayetteville to Rockingham in a Lexington car belonging to Maner, and, after spending a part of Sunday in Rockingham, they drove at night to Hamlet, six or seven miles away, and at about 8 o'clock the same night Jessup and Shaw drove back to Fayetteville from Hamlet in the Lexington car belonging to Maner, and later in the night Maner followed them to Fayetteville in the Ford car belonging to Anderson, which he found on the street in front of a moving picture house. When he arrived at Fayetteville he left the Ford car in front of his boarding house until morning and then placed it in front of the Jessup garage. An extra tire and some other minor equipment were taken from the Ford car and left in the garage.

There was evidence offered, but rejected by the court, that there had been an agreement between Maner and his brother-in-law, Jim Dleykan, that Maner should take Dleykan's car to Fayetteville and sell it, and that Maner made a mistake in taking the Anderson car for the Dleykan car, as the two looked very much alike, both being Ford's of the same model, and that there was no intention of stealing the Anderson car. Defendant was convicted and appealed.

W. C. Downing and McCormick & Clark, all of Fayetteville, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). Notwithstanding the exclusion of the evidence as to intent, the court charged the jury as to one of the contentions of the defendant being that the agreement had been made with Dleykan, and that the Anderson car was taken by Maner through error as to its identity and ownership, because of its similarity to the Dleykan car, explaining to the jury that, as defendants therefore contended, there was no felonious or dishonest intent in taking the Anderson car, but by his previous ruling he had left the defendant Jessup without the evidence to support this contention and also without the evidence to show that he had no knowledge that the Anderson car had been stolen. If we concede that there was evidence for the jury to the contrary of Jessup's contention—that is, such as would tend to show his guilty knowledge and felonious intent—it was error to exclude the evidence and thus disarm him so that he could not defend himself against the charge of the state.

It was manifestly competent to show by the defendant himself, if testifying in his own behalf, not only the absence of guilty knowledge that the car had been stolen, if it had been, but also the absence of Maner's intent to steal it. This court has expressly ruled upon this question of guilty knowledge, guilty motive or intent, in Phifer v. Erwin, 100 N. C. 59, at page 65, 6 S. E. 672, at page 675, where Chief Justice Smith said, citing and quoting from State v. King, 86 N. C. 803:

"The test of the admissibility of the evidence of motive or intent is the materiality of the motive or intent in giving character to the act, and when they must, as separate elements, co-exist to constitute guilt or produce a legal result. When, as distinct facts, each must be alleged and proved, the inference to be deduced may be met and repelled by the direct testimony of the party as to their being entertained by him."

See 1 Wharton on Evidence, § 482.

This is direct, instead of circumstantial, evidence as to guilty intent or knowledge or motive. In the Phifer Case the plaintiff, on his own behalf, was allowed, after objection, to state that he knew nothing of any understanding between the parties to the mortgage that the mortgagor was to remain in possession, when the goods were delivered to him, nor of any purpose on the part of either to defraud the mortgagor's creditors, and this upon the question of plaintiff's fraudulent knowledge or intent. This was held to be admissible.

There are several assignments of error as to other rulings, but they may not be presented again, and we will not consider them.

There was error in the rulings, as indicated above, because of which the defendant Jessup is entitled to another jury.

New trial.

STATE v. DIGGS et al. (No. 408.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 27, 1921.)

Conspiracy — 48—Instruction that one of several charged with conspiracy to murder could not be convicted held erroneous.

Where the indictment charged that defendants conspired amongst themselves and with others to assault and murder a third person, a charge that a verdict of guilty could not be returned against one of the defendants singly, and that all should be acquitted unless as many as two were convicted, is erroneous; for, while a conspiracy cannot be committed by one person alone and requires the confederation of at least two and may include more, the jury might have found that none of those indicted save one conspired, and that he conspired with the others not named.

Appeal from Superior Court, Anson County.

Frontis Diggs and 14 others were convicted of conspiring to assault and murder W. H. Watkins, and they appeal. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

The evidence tending to show an unlawful conspiracy among the defendants was equally as strong in establishing that others, not named in the bill, participated in what took place and aided and abetted the present defendants, or some of them.

Upon the question as to what verdict might be rendered, his honor charged the jury as follows:

"Gentlemen of the jury, you may return a verdict of guilty as to any two or more of the defendants or you may return a verdict of not guilty as to one or all of the defendants. You cannot find one alone guilty, because it is necessary that at least two combine in order to form a conspiracy. So your verdict may be guilty as to any two or more or all, or not guilty as to one or more or all, as you may find and are satisfied from the evidence."

Defendants excepted.

The court directed a verdict of not guilty as to seven of the defendants. Two were acquitted by the jury, and the remaining five, to wit, Frontis Diggs, Alex. Douglass, Watt, Frank, and Ben Robinson, were convicted, and from the judgments pronounced they appealed.

McLendon & Covington, of Wadesboro, and R. B. Redwine, of Monroe, for appellants.

J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and F. Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

STACY, J. The defendants were tried jointly, and rightly so. But we think his honor erred in charging the jury that a verdict of guilty could not be returned against one of the defendants singly, and that all should be acquitted unless as many as two were convicted. It is true the crime of conspiracy cannot be committed by one person alone. It requires the confederation of at least two, and, of course, it may include more. State v. Christianbury, 44 N. C. 46; State v. Younger, 12 N. C. 357, 17 Am. Dec. 571. But the bill charged that the defendants conspired among themselves and with others. Hence the jury might have found that only one of the defendants participated in the alleged offense with another or others not on trial. The instruction would have been correct had there been no evidence tending to incriminate others along with the present defendants, or had the indictment not been cum multis aliis. State v. Tom, 13 N. C. 569. Under the instant circumstances, however, we think the charge, as given, was prejudicial to the defendants, entitling them to a new trial.

There are other exceptions, appearing on the record, worthy of consideration; but, as the case goes back for another hearing, and as they may not occur again, we refrain from further comment.

New trial.

AMERICAN FERTILIZING CO. v. THOMAS. (No. 412.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 27, 1921.)

1. Evidence \S 383(4), 519—Under contract and statute, purchaser of fertilizer could not contradict state chemist's analysis.

Under Pub. Laws 1917, c. 143, as amended by Laws 1919, c. 120, making the certificate of a state chemist prima facie evidence of the constituents of fertilizer when the analysis is made, according to the statute, and under a contract with the purchaser of fertilizer "with guaranty only of analysis on the sack, and not of results of said fertilizer," and providing that the certificate of analysis by the state chemist or his testimony should be the only and conclusive evidence of the contents of fertilizer, the purchaser was not entitled to give evidence of failure of crops in a manner indicating presence of borax, denied by the analysis, or to give expert testimony denoting the presence of borax.

2. Agriculture \S 7—Evidence held not sufficient to carry to the jury the question of fraud in sale of fertilizer.

In an action for the price of fertilizer, evidence held insufficient to warrant submission to jury of question of fraud.

Appeal from Superior Court, Moore County; Ray, Judge.

Action by the American Fertilizing Company against D. J. Thomas. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover the price of fertilizer goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant in March, 1919, under a contract previously made.

The defendant admitted in his answer that he made the contract, and that exhibit A attached to the complaint is a true copy thereof.

The plaintiff alleged that it delivered to defendant, under the terms of said contract, fertilizer to the value of $2,547.46, nearly all of the fertilizers being Bone and Peruvian C. S. M. (cotton seed meal) 8—2—2 goods; that is to say, the guaranteed analysis appearing on the bags was 8.00 per cent. available phosphoric acid, 2.00 per cent. ammonia (equivalent to 1.65 per cent. nitrogen) and 2.00 per cent. potash.

The defendant admitted in his answer that the plaintiff delivered the quantities set out in the exhibit, attached to the complaint, but denied that the goods delivered were according to contract, and alleged that they were worthless and contained borax and other harmful ingredients, and denied that he owed the plaintiff anything, admitting, however, that he had paid plaintiff nothing.

Defendant then set up a cause of action or counterclaim for damages for results from use, alleging that the plaintiff wrongfully and fraudulently included borax and other harmful ingredients in the fertilizers sold and delivered to him, and that he used a part of them on his crops of corn, cotton, and tobacco, and that he was damaged thereby $1,500.

The plaintiff replied to the counterclaim and denied the allegations of the answer as to the presence of borax or other harmful ingredients, and for further reply alleged:

"That samples were drawn from said fertilizers, sold and delivered by plaintiff to the defendant, and known as 'American Bone and Peruvian C. S. M.,' and which defendant claims had done the damage to his crops, and said samples were submitted to the state chemist for analysis as provided by law, and were duly analyzed by him, at the request of the defendant, a copy of said certificate of analysis by the state chemist being attached, and as appears therefrom the result of the analysis was that the value of the guaranteed ingredients was equivalent to $38.05 per ton, whereas, the ingredients found by analysis were equivalent to $39.20 per ton, and that said analysis showed no borax or other deleterious substances, and the plaintiff is advised that a copy of said analysis was furnished to the defendant, and that at the request of defendant, the state chemist made a special analysis with a view to ascertain whether said fertilizer contained borax as claimed by the defendant, and that the state chemist, under date of July 15, 1919, wrote to the defendant as follows: 'We have made examination of the sample of fertilizers, the American Bone and Peruvian Cotton Seed Meal, manufactured by American Fertilizing Company, of Norfolk, our number 4211, sent in by you, for borax and do not find borax to be present.'"

The plaintiff also pleaded, as a bar to recovery by the defendant of any damages, the written contract between the parties, and especially paragraph 10 thereof, and the provisions of chapter 143 of the Public Laws of 1917, as amended by chapter 120 of the Public Laws of 1919. These acts are brought forward as sections 4690 to 4703 of Consol. Statutes.

The plaintiff offered in evidence the contract between the parties, being Exhibit A attached to the complaint, which is as follows:

"It is further agreed that all deliveries under this contract are made with guaranty only of analysis on the sack, and not of results from use of said fertilizers, or otherwise; and before using these fertilizers samples should be drawn and submitted to the state chemist (or other authorized state official) for analysis as provided by the law of the customer's state, and if any claim shall be made for inferiority or deficient analysis, the certificate of analysis by the state chemist (or other authorized state official) or his oral evidence shall be the best and only competent evidence of the contents of the goods, and shall be conclusive. If it shall appear from the said certificate, or test, that the goods do not come up to the guaranteed analysis, then the customer shall be entitled to recover the difference between the contract price and the actual value of the goods, as shown by the analysis made as above provided, which difference shall be ascertained, fixed and determined by the state chemist (or other authorized state official); and no other damage shall be recoverable for deficient analysis, or inferiority; provided, if damages for defective analysis or inferiority shall have been, or shall be assessed and paid as provided under State statute, then no other or further damage shall be collectible under the contract. A failure to draw this sample and submit it to the state chemist (or other authorized state official) as above provided, shall be a full waiver on the customer's part of any claim for deficient analysis or inferiority hereunder. As soon as these fertilizers are received, the customer shall examine them, and in case of any shortage in weight, or count, error in tagging or other objection to the goods, the customer shall notify the company within ten days, giving the company opportunity to make inspection and correction before the fertilizers are used, otherwise any claim for damage under this analysis, as above stated, is hereby waived, and it is further agreed that the company shall not be liable, for or required to make good, to the customer, any deficiency or claim for deficiency made or presented by any person purchasing from the customer."

The plaintiff next offered in evidence a verified itemized account of the goods sold and delivered; and also offered in evidence the certificate of analysis by the state chemist, attested by the seal of the Department of Agriculture, of a sample of the fertilizers drawn from the lot in the hands of the defendant, which is as follows:

"The official sealed sample of fertilizer received from the Commissioner of Agriculture has been analyzed, with the results as stated below:

"The fertilizer proves to be: Name: American Bone and Peruvian, C. S. M. Manufactured by: American Fertilizer Co. Address: Norfolk, Virginia. Drawn from lot in hands of D. J. Thomas, Carthage, N. C. (R. F. D. No. 2). The guaranteed percentage appearing on bags are: Available phosphoric acid, 8.00 per cent.; nitrogen, 1.65 per cent.; potash, 2.00 per cent.

"Result of Analysis.

"Available phosphoric acid, 8.80 (including soluble and reverted phosphoric acid).

"Nitrogen, 1.65.

"Potash, actual K. O. soluble in water 1.96.

"Note: Does not contain borax.

"The relative value of the guaranteed ingredients at the factory per ton of two thousand pounds is equivalent to $38.05. The relative value of the ingredients found by analysis, per ton of two thousand pounds, is equivalent to $39.20, using in each case the following figures: Available phosphoric acid, 7 cents per lb.; nitrogen, 45 cents per lb.; and potash, 30 cents per lb. These figures are based on the wholesale prices of the fertilizers or fertilizer materials (bagged) at factory."

The guaranteed percentages were: Available phosphoric acid, 8.00, nitrogen 1.65 per cent. (equivalent 2.00 per cent. ammonia), 2.00 per cent. potash. The analysis showed available phosphoric acid 8.80, nitrogen 1.65, potash 1.96. No borax. The value of the guaranteed ingredients was equivalent to $38.05, while the value of ingredients found by analysis was $39.20. These figures are based on the wholesale prices of the materials at factory, as required by Consol. Statutes, § 4695. In other words, the fertilizers delivered had $1.15 in value of plant food per ton more than the goods contracted for, and yet the defendant alleged the goods were worthless. The acid phosphate was above the guaranty .80 per cent., the nitrogen or ammonia was just in accordance with the guaranty, while the potash was .04 per cent. below the guaranty. Experience has shown that it is impossible, in mixing fertilizer materials, always to have the ingredients in exactly the guaranteed percentages, and the statute provides that, if the deficiency is 5 per cent. below the guaranteed value in plant food, the manufacturer is penalized, and it is further provided that—

"Any excess of any ingredient above the guaranty shall not be credited to the deficiency of any other ingredient if the deficiency is more than fifteen per cent." Consol. Statutes, § 4695.

The deficiency of potash was much less than 15 per cent.; in fact, only 2 per cent. At the time the sample was drawn from these 8—2—2 goods, in the hands of the defendant, he was claiming that they contained borax, and the analysis was made at the request of the defendant, for the purpose of ascertaining whether borax was in fact present, as the defendant claimed, and this accounts for the following notation on the analysis: "Does not contain borax."

All of the evidence which the defendant offered at the trial was for the purpose of showing that these 8—2—2 goods, from which the sample had been drawn and analyzed, did contain borax. The defendant himself testified that he had used these 8—2—2 goods, purchased from the plaintiff, on his crops of corn, cotton, and tobacco, and then he offered to show that he made poor crops and how the plants were affected. This was excluded. The defendant next proposed to show by a number of his neighbors, who had purchased from him the 8—2—2 goods of plaintiff, and who had used this fertilizer on their crops, that they made poor crops.

This was excluded. The defendant next propounded to Prof. Wolf, a botanist connected with the Experimental Station, a hypothetical question purporting to be based upon the excluded testimony, as to the condition of the crops where the 8—2—2 goods were used, and asked him, if the jury should find the facts to be as set forth, whether he had an opinion satisfactory to himself as to what caused this condition of the plants. The witness would have answered that these conditions were the symptoms of injury by borax. This is all the evidence the defendant offered.

It thus appears that all of the proffered testimony on the part of the defendant was directed to showing that the 8—2—2 goods contained borax. These were the goods the plaintiff sold the defendant, and which the defendant had caused to be officially analyzed by the state chemist for the express purpose of determining whether they did, in fact contain borax, and this analysis showed that the goods did not contain borax. The court excluded this proposed testimony in view of the statute applicable and the admitted contract between the parties and the decided cases. The statute provides as follows:

"The Department of Agriculture shall have the power at all times and at all places to have collected by its inspector samples of any commercial fertilizer or fertilizers material offered for sale in the state, and have the same analyzed; and such samples shall be taken from at least ten per cent. of the lot from which they may be selected; provided, that no sample shall be drawn from less than ten bags of any one brand."

The statute then provides in detail for the drawing of samples, and concludes as follows:

"In the trial of any suit or action wherein there is called in question the value or composition of any fertilizer, a certificate signed by the state chemist and attested with the seal of the Department of Agriculture, setting forth the analysis made by the state chemist of any sample of said fertilizer drawn under the provisions of this article, and analyzed by him under the provisions of the same, shall be prima facie proof that the fertilizer was of the value and constituency shown by his said analysis. And the said certificate of the state chemist shall be admissible in evidence to the same extent as if it were his deposition taken in said action in the manner prescribed by law for the taking of depositions. The department shall refuse to analyze any sample of commercial fertilizer that is not drawn and forwarded to the department [of agriculture] in accordance with the regulations which it may adopt for the carrying out of this article; provided, that no suit for damages from results of use of fertilizer may be brought except after chemical analysis showing deficiency of ingredients, unless it shall appear to the Department of Agriculture that the manufacturer of said fer-ttilizer in question has, in the manufacture of other goods offered in this state during such season, employed such ingredients as are outlawed by the provisions of this article, or unless it shall appear to the department of agriculture that the manufacturer of such fertilizer has offered for sale during that season any kind of dishonest or fraudulent goods. Nothing in this article shall impair the right of contract." Consol. Statutes, vol. 2, § 4697.

This statute was passed in 1917 and slightly amended in 1919 as to the method of drawing samples, and the statute expressly provides that "nothing in this article shall impair the right of contract." Acting under the provisions of this statute, the plaintiff and defendant entered into the contract set out above.

H. F. Seawell, R. L. Burns, L. B. Clegg, and U. L. Spence, all of Carthage, for appellant.

J. Crawford Biggs, of Raleigh, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It will be observed that the contract provides that—

"The certificate of analysis by the state chemist, or his oral evidence, shall be the best and only competent evidence of the contents of the goods, and shall be conclusive."

The certificate shows affirmatively that the contents of the goods are phosphoric acid 8.80, nitrogen 1.65, and potash 1.96, and that they do not contain borax. The parties have agreed that the analysis by the state chemist should be the best and only competent evidence of the contents of the goods, and conclusive; and it would seem that the evidence which the defendant proposed to offer to show that the goods contained borax, or, in other words, the contents of the goods were different from that shown by the analysis, was clearly incompetent.

A chemical analysis by a disinterested competent expert, such as the state chemist, is the best method of ascertaining the contents of fertilizers, and infinitely better than the method proposed by the defendant. "The best evidence is the analysis by the Agricultural Department," said Clark, C. J., in Fertilizer Works v. McLawhorn, 158 N. C. 274, 73 S. E. 888. In Carter v. McGill, 168 N. C. 507, 84 S. E. 802, the court said:

"The seller and the buyer of fertilizers can protect themselves by proper warranties, at the time of purchase, if they see fit to do so. The seller may restrict it, while the buyer may require that it be enlarged, according as their interests may dictate. Unless they do so, they must abide by the contract as made by them."

This was said in a case where the seller had not protected himself, as in the case at bar.

When Carter v. McGill, supra, was before the court on a rehearing, reported in 171 N. C. 775, 89 S. E. 28, the court said:

"It is proper, in this connection, to suggest that the plaintiff, and others in the fertilizer trade similarly situated, can protect themselves against too great a hazard in respect to the loss of crops by a provision in their contracts to the effect that they are not to be liable for any results from the use of the fertilizer, or for any loss of crops, as was done in the case of the contract which was the subject of the controversy between the parties in Guano Co. v. Live-Stock Co., 168 N. C. 442, where we held such a stipulation to be valid.

"Our attention has been called to a case recently decided in South Carolina, Germofert v. Cathcart, 88 S. E. 535, in which, upon careful examination, we find the court construed a contract almost identical in language with the one which was under consideration in Guano Co. v. Live Stock Co., 168 N. C. 442, and it held, as we did in the latter case, that the express warranty, and the restrictive clause therein as to nonliability for results, excluded the evidence as to failure of crops. See, also, Allen v. Young, 66 Ga. 617, which was cited for that position in Guano Co. v. Live Stock Co., supra, at page 448. In the Germofert Case, supra, the court said that 'the defendant cannot be allowed to avail himself of a method of defense that he has agreed not to use.' And again 'the defendant had agreed not to "hold payee responsible for practical results of said fertilizer on crops." The evidence and the charge responding to it was in direct violation of the agreement.' And so we said substantially in Guano Co. v. Live Stock Co., supra, the rule of damages having been fixed by the terms of the contract itself.

"While cases must be decided according to the rules of law, as well stated by Justice Hoke in Tomlinson v. Morgan, 166 N. C. 557, the strict enforcement of the rule may in some cases bear harshly upon a litigant, and it might do so in this class of cases. It is therefore expedient and proper that the dealer should be allowed to shield himself against possible injustice by adequate provision in the contract of sale. If he acts in good faith, he should not be unfairly dealt with; and it is not unusual, as the cases will show, to insert such a clause in contracts of this kind."

In Guano Co. v. Live Stock Co., 168 N. C. 442, 84 S. E. 774, L. R. A. 1915D, 875, the contract provided that "the fertilizer is furnished with the guarantee of analysis printed on the sack, but not of results from its use," and the court held this was a valid stipulation and that the guano company could not be held liable for any results from the use of the fertilizer, and the jury could consider the evidence as to the effect of the fertilizer on the crops, only for the purpose of showing the absence of the guaranteed ingredients or the represented quantities of each and not at all for the purpose of assessing damages either directly or indirectly, because of any loss or diminution of the crops, as the measure of damages depends upon quite a different principle. The extent of the recovery must be restricted to the difference, not necessarily between the price and the value of the article purchased, but to the difference between the article delivered under the contract of warranty and its value or market price if it had been such as it was warranted to be. The court then said:

"We have mentioned this subject for the purpose of showing that no part of the recovery, under this contract, should be assessed for the failure of crops, as there is an express stipulation that plaintiff should not be held liable for any results from the use of the fertilizer." Guano Co. v. Live Stock Co., supra, at pages 450, 451 of 168 N. C., at page 777 of 84 S. E. (L. R. A. 1915D, 875).

This was said in a case where the stipulation was that the fertilizer company only guaranteed the analysis on the bags, and was not liable for results from use, but there was no stipulation, as in the case at bar, that the analysis should be the best, only and conclusive evidence as to the contents of the goods. Nor was there a provision that when the goods were analyzed, the state chemist should determine the relative value of the guaranteed ingredients and those found on analysis as in this case. The state chemist did analyze the goods and found that those delivered exceeded in value the guaranteed goods sold by $1.15 per ton.

The recent case of Fertilizer Works v. Aiken, 175 N. C. 398, 95 S. E. 657, seems to be decisive of this case. There the earlier cases are reviewed and the court held that an express warranty guaranteeing a specified analysis, but not as to results on the crops, will protect the manufacturer or vendor from damages claimed for loss or diminution of crops, because the goods were not fitted for the purposes for which they were bought, this being a warranty ordinarily implied in such contracts, citing Carter v. McGill, 168 N. C. 507, 84 S. E. 802; s. c., 171 N. C. 775, 89 S. E. 28; Guano Co. v. Live Stock Co., 168 N. C. 443, 84 S. E. 774, L. R. A. 1915D, 875; Germofert v. Cathcart, 104 S. C. 125, 88 S. E. 535; Allen v. Young, 62 Ga. 617.

In the Aiken Case, the fertilizer company sued for the fertilizers sold under a contract, in the following terms:

"I hereby acknowledge I have received and used the above fertilizer without any guarantee on the part of Armour Fertilizer Works, or its agents, as to results from its use, and which have been inspected, tagged and branded under and in accordance with the laws of this state; and I hereby waive all claims, damages, and penalties in case of deficiency, except claim for the actual commercial value of deficiency when, and only when, ascertained and determined by the state chemist from samples taken in the presence of seller, or seller's authorized representative, from fertilizers for which this note is given."

The defendant alleged in his answer that the fertilizer was utterly worthless. In referring to the contract, this court said:

"In this contract it will be noted that the stipulations in protection of the vendor go much beyond those appearing in the case just referred to. [168 N. C. 443.] * * * In its terms and purpose it is broad enough to exclude and does exclude any and all evidence as to the effect of the fertilizer on the crops, the agreement being as shown that the purchaser waives all claims except those for the 'commercial value of the deficiency' from the stipulated standard, and this only 'when ascertained and determined by the state chemist from samples taken from the fertilizers sold and in the presence of the seller or his authorized agent.' We are of opinion that such a stipulation is in every way a reasonable one, well calculated to promote and insure fair and safe dealing in this important matter and not only not opposed to any public policy prevailing with us, but the same is in accord with direct suggestion of this court in Carter v. McGill, supra, and fully recognized and approved in our latest legislation on the subject. Laws 1917, c. 143."

The contract in this case is, in its terms, very similar to the one in the Aiken Case. It provides, among other things:

"If any claims shall be made for inferiority or deficient analysis, the certificate of analysis by the state chemist shall be the best and only competent evidence of the contents of the goods and shall be conclusive. If it shall appear from the said certificate that the goods do not come up to the guaranteed analysis, then the customer shall be entitled to receive the difference between the contract price and the actual value of the goods as shown by the analysis, which difference shall be ascertained by the state chemist, and no other damage shall be recoverable for deficient analysis or inferiority."

The court, referring to the statute which had just been passed, Laws 1917, c. 143 (now Consol. Statutes, §§ 4690 to 4703, as amended in 1919, as to method of sampling), said:

"The statute in question, repealing sections 3945 to 3956 of Revisal, inclusive, makes elaborate and minute provision with the view of insuring a correct analysis of these important commodities and in protection both of the manufacturer and vendor and of the purchaser and consumer; directs the employment of sufficient chemists and assistants; provides for an analysis at the instance of the purchaser or by its own agents when necessary; provides, further, that samples for the purpose shall be taken always in the presence of the agent, seller or dealer or some representative of the manufacturers or if none of these can be present or if they refuse to act, then in the presence of two disinterested witnesses, etc. That no suit for damages shall be brought for results in use except after chemical analysis showing deficiency of ingredients unless the dealer has been selling goods that are outlawed by the statute or has offered for sale during the season dishonest or fraudulent goods. Having thus dealt very fully with the subject, recognizing as sound the principle of selecting the samples in the presence of the manufacturer or dealer, section 7 of the act concludes with the proviso that "nothing in this act shall impair the right of contract," showing the clear intent and purpose of the Legislature to allow to either party the privilege of making further stipulations in reasonable protection of their interests and in accord with established principles of law. In McLawhorn v. Fertilizer Works, 158 N. C. 274, * * * decided intimation is given that this is the true public policy and the correct interpretation of our former statute on the subject and undoubtedly it should prevail under the present law."

The court further said, with reference to that language, that it was much stronger for the protection of the manufacturer than is that used in the case of Guano Co. v. Livestock Co., supra, and we now say that the language of the contract in this case is, if anything, much more restrictive of the customer's right to question the truth and accuracy of the statements contained in the official (and also in this case contractual) analysis of the state chemist. The parties were free to enter into a contract with regard to the matter, and to bind, and even conclude, themselves, and each one of them, by its stipulations. They made for themselves in their dealings a contractual rule of evidence, each being at arm's length with the other, there was nothing in it contrary to public policy, and therefore they must be held as subject to its terms and their rights and obligations must be determined accordingly.

But the defendant contends that there was fraud, in that the plaintiff had mixed borax with the other ingredients of the fertilizer, and his crops were damaged thereby, as it was the opinion of his expert witness, who was a botanist, that borax was injurious to the crops, and their appearance indicated symptoms showing that they had been poisoned by borax. But the full and complete answer to all of this contention is that it has been shown by the analysis of the state chemist (the party to whom the law, and the parties by their contract, referred the matter for a final decision, which should bind them "conclusively") that there was no borax in the fertilizer. There is no allegation, or suggestion, that there was any fraud practiced by the chemist in making his decision or award, or even by the plaintiff in preventing an honest report; but, on the contrary, and as far as appears, the certificate of the analysis was fairly and honestly made, without even any hint at fraud or collusion. We do not say that fraud would not be sufficient to set aside a false certificate of the facts, as to the value and potency of the fertilizer, but it has not been shown in this case, or attempted to be shown. The defendant, himself, requested the state chemist to make the analysis, and, besides, he solemnly agreed that it should bind and conclude him. If he had any doubt of its correctness, or even if he did not have such doubt, and wished to be assured of its correctness, he could then have retained another chemist of his own choice and possessing greater skill and expertness, if he thus appraised him. In the absence of such a showing of fraud the certificate must stand as conclusive evidence that the analysis is correct. It certainly cannot be impeached by the opinion even of the crop indicated symptoms of borax poisoning. If we should hold otherwise, it an expert botanist that the appearance of would impair very seriously the efficacy of the statute, and annul the contract of the parties, the execution of which is not assailed for fraud.

[2] There is no sufficient evidence of fraud for the jury. The most that can be said in behalf of defendant's position is that the opinion of the botanist formed by a mere inspection of the crop, as to the presence of borax in the fertilizer, is too uncertain, conjectural, and unreliable to be received as proof, and can hardly be of the least probative force if admitted, when considered in the light of the statute and the stipulations of the parties, by which it has been excluded as unfit for the purpose of establishing the alleged fact of fraud. It has been agreed, and the law so declares, that the only evidence shall be the certificate of the analysis as made by the state chemist, and that shows "conclusively" that there was no borax in the formula by which the fertilizer was made. The report of the analysis by the chemist, both impliedly and expressly, declares that there was no borax or other deleterious substance in the fertilizer, and, as we have said, there is nothing to impeach that finding for fraud or other reason; therefore the opinion of the botanist must be discarded. If we should admit such evidence, instead of the certificate being an absolute protection for the manufacturer or dealer in fertilizers as we have said it was intended to be by the law and the contract, it would be little more than a delusion and a snare.

In the case of Germofert Mfg. Co. v. Cathcart, 104 S. C. 125, 88 S. E. 535, the court passes upon this very question in the following language:

"There was no attempt made to analyze the fertilizer. Ample provision is made by law to secure a reliable analysis. The defendant had agreed that the test of value should be made by analysis. No man can look at a crop (dead or alive) and tell what per cent. of ammonia or potash or other substance it contained. They did not pretend to do so. The defendant had agreed not to 'hold payees responsible for practical results of said fertilizer on crops.' This evidence, and the charge responding to it, was in direct violation of the agreement. It cannot be said that test of value by analysis is an unlawful contract, because the statutes recognize a test by analysis. The defendant signed a perfectly lawful contract, with ample protection afforded by law. The defendant cannot refuse to adopt the protection approved by law and offered by his contract and be allowed to avail himself of a method of defense that he has agreed not to use. Some substances may kill because they are true to analysis."

There was a dissenting opinion in the case, but we most respectfully think that it completely missed the real question in that case, and is based entirely upon a misconception of the point involved. The majority opinion stated the point and the pertinent principle correctly, placing the decision upon the clause discharging the seller from all responsibility for "results upon the crops."

We must hold, therefore, that there is no reason shown why the judgment of the superior court should be disturbed.

No error.

In re JOHNSON'S WILL. (No. 397.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 27, 1921.)

1. Wills §96—No particular form required.

No particular form is required for the disposition of property by a will, and letters, when properly executed, may be valid.

2. Wills §96—Paper writing must show it was written "animo testendi."

That a will may be valid it must appear that the paper writing offered for probate, whatever its form, was written animo testendi, meaning not that the maker intended thereafter to make a will on the terms of the paper, but that it was his intention that the paper itself should operate as the disposition of his property to take effect after his death.

3. Wills §96—Letter held not a will.

Letter written by testator held not his will as showing on its face that it was not his intention the paper should operate itself as a will but merely that he had in contemplation the preparation of a will by the addressee, whereby the final disposition of his property should be made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; J. Bis Ray, Judge.

Proceeding for the production and probate of the will of J. Vestal Johnson. From an adverse judgment, the proponents appeal. Affirmed.

This is a proceeding for the production and probate of a certain paper writing as the will of J. Vestal Johnson. At the hearing his honor found the following facts, to which all parties agreed:

"(1) That J. Vestal Johnson died in the county of Guilford, state of North Carolina, after an illness of one week, on June 17, 1918, possessed of real and personal property.

"(2) At the time of his death, and some time prior thereto, he had been renting part of his dwelling to the husband of Mrs. Bettie Brintle, and the Brintle family was living in said dwelling house, the deceased reserving a room for his own occupation.

"(3) That some few days after his death, Mrs. Bettie Brintle, while engaged in cleaning up the room formerly occupied by the deceased, found a pasteboard box, such as is usually used by clothing merchants in which to deliver clothes when sold to customers. That this pasteboard box was in his room, and he usually kept his suits of clothes therein, and same was usually kept in his trunk, and he kept his valuable papers in his trunk. That the said Mrs. Brintle took his clothes out to air, and from the pocket of one of his coats which he had been wearing there fell a stamped envelope, sealed and addressed to 'Mr. Joe Sechrest, High Point, N. C.'

"(4) That said envelope, with its contents, was sent by Mrs. Brintle to the said Sechrest, and opened by the said Sechrest, and found by him to contain a letter as follows:

"High Point, N. C., June 10, 1918.

"Dear Joe: You know that we was talking about my will. I want you to write my will for me, and also I want you to bury me in a steel gray casket, and a steel gray case, which can be locked so water can't get to me, and want you to put nice tombs to my grave. You pay $200.00 for the tombs. And I want to give little Junita Franklin $100.00 and little Pauline Lambeth $100.00; and I want to give Mrs. Brintle my home house and lot, and the rest of my property to be equally divided among my people. Joe, you please do this favor for me, and I will pay you what you charge for your trouble. I will be up town as soon as I get able. I don't feel good to day. I will close. Joe, you copy this with ink for me.

"As ever, your friend, J. Vestal Johnson."

"5. That said paper writing was not delivered by the decedent to the said Sechrest to whom it was directed, nor delivered by him to any one, but that it was kept by him from its date, to wit, the 10th day of June, 1918, until his death on the 17th day of June, 1918, and was not out of his possession, although it was sealed and stamped."

All of said paper was in the handwriting of the said Johnson. His honor held that said paper was not a will, and entered judgment accordingly, and the propounders excepted and appealed.

L. B. Williams and C. C. Barnhardt, both of High Point, for appellants.

E. D. Steele, of High Point, and King, Sapp & King, of Greensboro, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. [1] No particular form is required for the disposition of property by will, and in the application of this principle it has been held frequently that letters were valid as wills, when properly executed. In re Ledford, 176 N. C. 612, 97 S. E. 482.

[2] It must, however, appear that the paper writing offered for probate, whatever its form, was written animo testendi, by which is meant, not that the maker intended thereafter to make a will on the terms of the paper, but, that it was his intention that the paper itself should operate as a disposition of his property, to take effect after his death.

In the Bennett Case, 180 N. C. 5, 103 S. E. 917, the court refused probate of a letter offered as a will because it did not appear that it was the intention then to make a will, and among other things says:

"A will may take the form of an assignment, or of a deed, or of a power of attorney, or of a letter, or of a promissory note, or of an order, etc., say the authorities. It may assume the form of any instrument, or be absolutely informal. This principle is well settled, and numerous examples of such wills are to be found in the law books and decisions of the courts here and abroad (Gardner on Wills [1st Ed.] pp. 36 to 43), and the courts have gone very far to support such documents as valid wills; but at the same time they have required sufficient certainty and assurance as to the intention to presently, or at the time the particular document comes into existence, make a will, and as to that paper being the very will he intended to make. Gardner, at p. 40, says: 'So a letter written by a testator to a friend authorizing him to take charge and dispose of the testator's property, and to sell and convey the same as his executor, properly attested, sufficiently evidences the testator's intention to dispose of his property, and may be probated as a will. But a letter, like any other instrument, to take effect as a will, must be executed in compliance with the requirements of a statute, and must express a genuine and not merely an anticipated testamentary intent.'"

And again:

"In the case of In re Estate of C. B. Richardson (appeal of Nina R. Hardee), 94 Cal. 63, 29 Pac. 484, 15 L. R. A. 635, the court held that a letter which merely expressed a desire that his sister and her children get everything he owned, but containing words indicating that they should take it by a formal will, or by one he would make, was not testamentary in character, but only the expression of a desire; it clearly not being the intention that the letter should be so construed as to become his last will."

[3] Following these precedents it must be held that the paper writing offered for probate is not the will of J. Vestal Johnson, because it shows on its face that it was not the intention of the deceased that the paper should operate as a will, but merely that he had in contemplation the preparation of a will by which final disposition of his property should be made. He says, "I want you to write my will for me," indicating a clear purpose to have a will prepared and that he was simply outlining the contents of a will. Again, "I want you to give," etc., which is simply an instruction for the preparation of a will. "I will pay you what you charge for your trouble," which was for the preparation of the will.

There is nothing in the paper to show a present purpose that it should be the final disposition of his property, to take effect after his death, and, on the contrary, the whole letter gives indication that he was giving instructions for the preparation of a will, and the fact that he retained the paper instead of mailing it furnishes evidence that he had not fully determined what he would do with his property.

The refusal to submit an issue as to the intention of the deceased was not erroneous, as this intent must be gathered from the letter and the surrounding circumstances; and a finding of the jury contrary to the language used in the letter could not be sustained.

Affirmed.

ALSTON v. WILLIAMS. (No. 102.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 9, 1921.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Warren County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by Lizzie Alston, executrix of T. N. Alston, deceased, against R. E. Williams. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

This is an action to recover the value of certain cotton, which the plaintiff alleges the defendant received as agent and failed to account for. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

T. T. Hicks, of Henderson, for appellant.

Frank H. Gibbs, of Warrenton, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. An examination of the record creates the impression with us that the plaintiff has probably recovered more than the defendant ought to pay, but we find no error which would justify disturbing the verdict and judgment.

No error.

BUCKHORN LAND & TIMBER CO. v. YARBOROUGH. (No. 108.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 9, 1921.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Chatham County; Bond, Judge.

Action by the Buckhorn Land & Timber Company against J. A. Yarborough. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. No error.

Civil action to recover two tracts of land, consisting of 110 acres and 7½ acres, respectively. Upon issues joined, the following verdict was rendered by the jury:

"(1) Was E. J. Yarborough, at the time she executed the deed to J. A. Yarborough for the 110-acre tract described in the amended complaint, the tenant of the company from and under whom plaintiff Land & Timber Company claims title?

"Answer: No.

"(2) Is the plaintiff Land & Timber Company the owner and entitled to the possession of the lands described in the amended complaint?

"Answer: No."

Judgment on the verdict in favor of defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

A. A. F. Seawell and Hoyle & Hoyle, all of Sanford, and Siler & Barber, for appellant.

Baggett & Mordecai and Ross & Salmon, all of Lillington, and A. C. Ray and W. P. Horton, both of Pittsboro, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. This case was before the court at the Spring term, 1920, and reported in 179 N. C. 335, 102 S. E. 630. The same questions there presented and discussed are raised again on this appeal. We deem it unnecessary to reiterate what was said on the former hearing.

Upon trial in the superior court, the case was made to turn on the character of E. Jane Yarborough's possession of the locus in quo. Plaintiff contended that she occupied and held the lands as a tenant of plaintiff's predecessor in title. This was denied by the defendant, and upon issue joined there was a verdict adverse to the plaintiff's contention.

The case also involved a question of estoppel and a plea of the statute of limitations; but, after a careful examination of the record and plaintiff's exceptions, we think the verdict and judgment should stand.

No error.

SPRUILL v. BONNER. (No. 176.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 9, 1921.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Pamlico County; Bond, Judge.

Action by Jas. Spruill against W. S. Bonner to recover the price of a carload of Irish potatoes. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. No error.

D. L. Ward, of New Bern, and Z. V. Rawls, of Bayboro, for appellant.

F. C. Brinson, of Bayboro, and Ward & Ward, of New Bern, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. This was a controversy over an alleged sale of 177 barrels of Irish potatoes. Upon issue joined, the jury found that the potatoes in question were not purchased by the defendant, W. S. Bonner, but that plaintiff sold the same to one M. P. McCann. This was a question of fact, which the jury has answered in favor of the defendant.

We have carefully examined the record, and find no sufficient reason for disturbing the verdict and judgment.

No error.

BRADLEY et al. v. CALHOUN. (No. 10603.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 18, 1921.)

1. Judgment \S 951(2), 958(2)—Record of decrees concerning disposition of land held admissible in action for partition.

In an action for partition of land by persons claiming under a will as remaindermen, the court did not err in admitting in evidence, for what they were worth, equity records of decrees concerning the land in so far as the tract of land, the subject of the controversy, was concerned, but, after they were admitted in evidence, the court should have submitted the question as to whether plaintiffs were parties or not to the proceedings in which such decrees were entered.

2. Judgment \S 17(1)—No one bound unless cited to appear and afforded opportunity to be heard; "day in court."

No one shall be personally bound by a decree until he has had his day in court; that is, he must be cited to appear and afforded an opportunity to be heard.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Day in Court.]

3. Judgment \S 490(1), 501—Void judgment subject to collateral attack, but not voidable judgment.

If a decree is void and the parties not served, there is a fatal defect without proof, but, if a decree is voidable and there is a hidden infirmity which can only appear by proof, the infirmity cannot be shown in a collateral manner, but only by a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose.

4. Judgment \S 710—Decree putting fee in life tenant not binding on remaindermen not parties to proceeding.

A decree of a chancellor simply putting the fee in the life tenant, thus destroying the purpose of a will, was an absolutely void act, where remaindermen were not before the court in the proceeding by person, privies, or class, or some competent person to represent them.

5. Executors and administrators \S 335—All persons in esse necessary parties in proceeding to sell land.

In proceeding to sell land left to life tenant and remaindermen, all persons in esse who have any special interest in the property, without reference to what may be the precise character of that interest, should be made parties.

6. Executors and administrators \S 388(1)—One purchasing land sold as absolute estate of decedent acquired only such title as he had.

One purchasing land sold in probate proceeding as the absolute estate of a decedent acquired only such title as such decedent had, where such purchaser had notice that decedent was only entitled to a life estate and was only legally holding the land as trustee for remaindermen.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Allendale County; I. W. Bowman, Judge.

Action by J. R. Bradley and others against Belle Bradley Calhoun. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Hendersons, of Aiken, and Brown & Bush and Harley & Blatt, all of Barnwell, for appellants.

Holman & Boulware, of Barnwell, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an action for partition of what is generally known as the John W. Bradley home place, said place contains 148 acres or 153 acres. Appellants contend that they are the children and grandchildren of John W. Bradley, deceased, and as such are entitled to seven-eighths undivided interest in said land, under the will of William Cave. They concede one-eighth undivided interest is in the respondent, who was the only daughter of said John W. Bradley, by a second wife, Julia R. Bradley.

The answer of the respondent denied title in the appellants and claims absolute title in herself as sole heir at law of Julia R. Bradley, the second wife of John W. Bradley; it being contended that the said Julia R. Bradley acquired title to said tract of land by sale by the probate judge of Barnwell county in the year 1877 under proceedings instituted to sell said property of John W. Bradley for payment of his debts. Respondent also sets up proceeding, under which it is claimed said sale took place and the deed of probate judge to Julia R. Bradley as res adjudicata of the question of title which is at issue in this section, and a further plea of res adjudicata, of said title under certain proceedings in the old court of equity, and also sets up statute of limitations, presumption of a great and adverse possession and a general denial.

Appellants claim title to land in dispute under the will of William Cave, dated May 11, 1849, and probated in the county of Barnwell November 18, 1855. The cause was tried before Judge Bowman and a jury at February term, 1920, and he directed a verdict for the defendant. Plaintiffs appeal, and by six exceptions allege error. Exceptions 1, 2, 3, and 4 will be considered together. They complain of error on the part of his honor in admitting in evidence the alleged equity records, because it appears affirmatively in said records there was nothing to show that the plaintiffs were ever parties to that proceeding, and there is nothing to show in any paper produced in these records that their names were ever mentioned. The records not even mentioning the remaindermen by name, and there is nothing therein by which it could be presumed that they were parties to that suit.

[1, 2] We do not see any error on the part of his honor in admitting in evidence for what it was worth the record, in so far as the tract of land, the subject of this controversy, is concerned. But after they were admitted in evidence his honor should have submitted the question as to whether they were parties or not to these proceedings; for, if they were not parties, then the decree of Chancellor Johnstone and Chancellor Inglis did not preclude them from asserting their rights as remaindermen under the will of William Cave. No one shall be personally bound until he has had his day in court; he must be cited to appear and afforded the opportunity to be heard.

"A judgment against a party not named in the complaint nor any part of the record is void. We cannot presume that one who does not appear to have been a party had his day in court." Freeman on Judgments (2d Ed.) § 141.

"If the judgment or decree is silent upon the subject of service of summons and the service shown by the return upon the summons is not such as will give the court jurisdiction, no doubt the judgment is void." Freeman on Judgments, § 133.

[3] If the decrees are void and the parties not served, that is a fatal defect without proof. If it is a voidable judgment and a hidden infirmity which can only appear by proof, in the latter case the infirmity cannot be shown in a collateral manner, but only by a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. Turner v. Malone, 24 S. C. 404.

The contention of the appellants here is that the record does not show they were parties; that by reason of that the judgment is void; that it is not a voidable judgment, but a void judgment. In Finley v. Robertson, 17 S. C. 438, the minors accepted service. Judge Hudson held that could not be done, and says:

"The record of this inferior court fails to show the law has been complied with in that action, either in making the infants parties, or in the appointment of guardian ad litem; on the contrary, it shows proper steps not taken."

In that case Judge Hudson sustained the judgment as to the adults, and only avoided it as to the infants. Justice McGowan, in delivering the opinion of the court, says:

"There was no proof offered that contradicted the record, and this case may also be considered as coming within the category of those where the mere exhibition of the record disclosed the fatal infirmity, and, to that extent, made the judgment void." 24 S. C. 406.

Justice Jones, in Clark v. Neves, 76 S. C. 484, 57 S. E. 614, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 298, says:

"When it appears affirmatively on the face of the record that an infant has not been served with summons, the infant is not bound by the proceedings. Bailey v. Bailey, 41 S. C. 337, 19 S. E. 669, 728, 44 Am. St. Rep. 713. If the record is silent as to such jurisdictional matters with respect to a court of general jurisdiction, it will be presumed that what ought to have been done was done; but where the record discloses the manner in which service on the infants was attempted to be made, there is no presumption that they were served in any other way. Rice v. Bamberg, 59 S. C. 505," 38 S. E. 211.

The Cave will created a trust. By his will Cave gave the real estate to his executors in trust for his grandchildren, to be equally divided amongst them. The land in specie belonged to the life tenant and the remaindermen. He provided that, if partition was impracticable equally and fairly, the property should be sold and the proceeds invested in other real or personal property by the executors for the use of the life tenants and the remaindermen. This was a trust with implied powers, to be executed in a specific way by partition in kind, and, if that was impracticable, by sale, and a specific declaration that the proceeds of the sale were to be reinvested.

[4] Now, the respondent presents the decrees of Chancellors Johnstone and Inglis to the court, and insists that these decrees show that the fee to the land in controversy went into John W. Bradley. The Johnstone decree put the land in dispute into John W. Bradley for life, in accordance with the terms and limitations of the will of Cave, and effectually completed what the executors were empowered to do. But the Inglis decree, a new proceeding, reverses the status entirely, and declares it invested in the life tenant, John W. Bradley, in fee simple, and does not require the executors, as required by the will in the trust created, to reinvest the proceeds, and takes from the remaindermen entirely their right to the land, and in no way orders a sale for the purpose of reinvestment. The trustees made no sale, although authorized to sell, but the decree simply put the fee in John W. Bradley without any words of inheritance. The decree of Chancellor Inglis did not direct a deed to be made, but simply put the fee in John W. Bradley. The effect of the Inglis decree destroys the purpose of the will of Cave, and, unless the appellants were before the court when it was passed, by person, privies, or class, or some competent person to represent them, then what was done, as far as their rights are affected, is an absolutely void act. In Dumas v. Carroll, 112 S. C. 296, 99 S. E. 804, Mr. Justice Hydrick says:

"It has been held by this court, in cases too numerous to mention, that the courts have no power to make or modify deeds or wills made according to law. If the right, which is deemed by most people a very sacred one, of disposing of one's property as he may see fit, is to be preserved in this state, the judges must resolutely set their face against a practice, which is said to be too common, of destroying trusts created by will or deed, or interfering with the testator's or grantor's disposition thereof by consent decrees, especially where the rights and interests of infants or contingent remaindermen are affected. Where the parties are sui juris and their rights alone are affected, they may, of course, do as they please. But where the rights of infants or unborn remaindermen who are only constructively before the court are to be affected, the court should see to it that theirs are not injuriously affected. It is the duty of the courts to preserve and not destroy or allow the parties in interest to destroy or alter trusts and other dispositions of property, where the same have been made and created according to law, and violate no rule of law; otherwise the jus disponendi is of no value.

"It must not be understood that the courts should exercise such power over trust estates, which is a well-recognized feature of equitable jurisdiction, as may be necessary to prevent them from going to waste, or to make necessary improvements for the maintenance of the beneficiaries, or to change investments, and the like. But even these powers are to be exercised with great caution, and generally so as to preserve rather than to destroy trusts and other dispositions of property."

[5] In Mauldin v. Mauldin, 101 S. C. 1, 85 S. E. 60, a family settlement was agreed on to obviate a family litigation between the members of the family some of whom were dissatisfied with some of the provisions of the will, and a consent decree was taken, carrying out the proposed settlement. This court reversed the decree on the ground, among others, that it disturbed the testator's disposition of his property, which cannot be done without cogent reason therefor. Again, in Cagle v. Schaefer et al., 115 S. C. 89, 101 S. E. 321, it is held:

"A guardian ad litem is bound to look after the infant's interest and to act for him in all matters relating to the suit as the infant might act if of capacity; and the mere filing of a formal answer submitting the infant's rights to the protection of the court is not a sufficient compliance with the guardian's duty. * * * Where a court of equity has before it all the parties in interest who are in esse, it may for protection of an estate order the sale of lands, which are subject to remainders, etc., and a possible trust, but the power cannot be exercised save in case of a reasonable necessity."

All persons in esse who have any special interest in the subject-matter, without reference to what may be the precise character of that interest, should be made parties. So in the present case these appellants, as remaindermen, under their great-grandfather's will, should have been made parties to any suit that affected their special interests.

The law provides for the manner in which all records in judgment rolls are to be kept, and we have both criminal and civil statutes providing a penalty for any officer allowing them to go out of his possession. The violations of these wise statutes by the officers and attorneys are to be deplored.

As we have said before, the records or parts of them produced and where they come from should be admitted in evidence for what they are worth, but the question should have been submitted to the jury as to whether or not these appellants' rights had been adjudicated by the Johnstone and Inglis decrees, or whether, notwithstanding these decrees, they are to be entitled to assert their rights as remaindermen, under the will of William Cave, and recover. All presumptions one way or the other should be solved by a jury, under proper instructions of law, by the court.

[8] The exceptions raising the questions passed on are sustained. Exception 5 is sustained for the reason that, if John W. Bradley only had a life estate in the land, nothing else was sold, and his widow only purchased and acquired such title as he had. If it should turn out the fee was in him, then she purchased that, but there is testimony in the case that John W. Bradley frequently asserted that he only had a life estate, and that his widow knew that, and should be charged with that notice when she purchased at probate court's sale. In Sullivan v. Latimer, it is held, 35 S. C. 422, 14 S. E. 933:

"Where one purchases * * * land sold as the absolute estate of A., knowing at the time that A. held it only as a trustee for his sister and her children, the purchaser takes the land subject to the trust, and becomes himself the trustee, and cannot, while retaining possession, acquire title by prescription, or hold it under the statute of limitations, without clear proof of adverse possession. The mere retention of possession of land, subject to a trust, is not adverse to the certainis que trust, nor are they barred by laches from asserting their rights because of their nonaction for the space of 20 years."

All questions of ouster, adverse possession, the minorities of the appellants, affecting the different periods of possession, whether of adverse possession, statute of limitations, or presumptions of grant are disputed questions, and should be submitted to the jury.

The record in the probate court does not show that the title was adjudicated other than such title as John W. Bradley had in the land ordered sold, and it was not an adjudication against the appellants.

Judgment reversed, and a new trial granted.

GARY, C. J., and FRASER, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). I dissent from the judgment in this case and will endeavor to make clear my reasons therefor.

I fully concur in the conclusion that the plea of res adjudicata under the alleged equity record of 1861 cannot be sustained, for the reason that it does not appear affirmatively as it should that the Bradley re-maindermen were parties to that proceeding. I think that for that reason the record should have been excluded. It is not only useless, but improper, to submit to a jury evidence the admissibility and efficacy of which depends upon an issue of law, which the circuit judge sooner or later in the trial must decide.

The decree of Chancellor Johnstone in the partition proceeding of Robert Bradley et al. v. Marion Cave et al., dated February 12, 1856, distinctly adjudges that the 153-acre tract, the subject of this litigation, be allotted to John W. Bradley, subject to the limitations contained in the will of William Cave.

Both of these equity proceedings may therefore be eliminated from the case.

My difficulty in concurring arises from my conception of the effect of the proceedings in the probate court under which this land was sold in aid of assets to pay debts.

The probate proceedings: It is conceded, and may well be, that under the will of William Cave, after the real estate had been partitioned and a portion allotted to John W. Bradley, the 153 acres so allotted, the subject of this litigation vested in John W. Bradley for life, with remainder at his death to such child or children as he might leave living at the time of his death. This partition took place in 1856, William Cave having died in 1855, and John W. Bradley went into possession of the 153-acre tract, as tenant for life, so recognized his tenure, and continued in possession until his death in 1875. He left surviving him seven children by his first wife, Wm. H. (26), Elizabeth (24), Martha (22), J. R. (18), B. F. (17), Caroline (14), Mary (10), and one by his second wife, the defendant, Belle B. Calhoun (4), and a widow, Julia R. Bradley. It will be noted that at the instant of his death the title vested in the children above named in fee.

In 1877 William H. Bradley, the oldest son and the administrator of the estate of John W. Bradley, instituted an action in the court of probate for Barnwell county for the sale of the real estate of John W. Bradley, in aid of the personal property to pay debts. The above-named heirs at law of John W. Bradley were made parties. The "case" states that they were all properly served. At that time three of the children were of age Wm. H. (28), Elizabeth (26), and Martha (24). The others J. R. (20), B. F. (19), Carolina (16), Mary (12), and Belle (6) appeared in said action by guardian ad litem, who answered denying knowledge of the matters set forth in the complaint, claiming such interest in the premises as they might be entitled to, and submitting their rights and interests to the protection of the court. The complaint alleged that at the time of his death John W. Bradley was "seized in fee simple" of the 153-acre tract, describing it. It does not appear that there were any answers filed or served by any of the parties except the minor defendants by guardian ad litem. On March 20, 1877, the probate judge granted a decree of sale. Thereafter, and before sale, the widow claimed and was assigned as dower 33 acres of the 153 being surveyed and allotted to her under regular proceedings, which were duly confirmed on November 10, 1877. The sale was ordered for December 3, 1877; the dower of Mrs. Bradley, life estate in 33 acres allotted to her, being excepted by the order of the sale. The sale was duly advertised and had on December 3, 1877, at which the property was bid off by Mrs. Bradley at $115. She complied with the terms of the sale, and on December 4, 1877, received from the probate judge a conveyance of said premises, duly recorded on December 31, 1877, a fee-simple title. It appears that she continued in possession of the property, some of the stepchildren and her own child living with her for a while and at various times, until her death in 1910, after which the defendant Mrs. Calhoun appears to have been in possession claiming this property as sole heir at law of her mother and through the deed of the probate judge. There is some testimony to the effect that John W. Bradley frequently recognized the interests of the remaindermen; that Mrs. Bradley knew of this, and after the deed of the probate judge to her did the same thing; and that her possession was by the sufferance of the remaindermen who acquiesced in the arrangement of a home for her as long as she lived.

There are two very important questions which arise in connection with the foregoing statement:

(1) What was the effect upon the rights of the remaindermen of the proceedings in the probate court?

(2) If those proceedings did not conclude the rights of the remaindermen, should the question of the title of Mrs. Bradley by adverse possession, statute of limitations, and presumption of a grant have been submitted to the jury?

It is clear that, if those proceedings did conclude the rights of the remaindermen, the second question need not be considered; if they did not, the claim of the defendant that the mother had acquired the title by adverse possession, statute of limitations, or presumption of a grant would still be open for adjudication, unless it appears that there is no evidence at all to support it.

The first question: The probate court had unquestioned jurisdiction, under section 45 of the Code, to entertain the proceeding for the sale of the "real estate of such deceased person," in aid of the personal property, to pay the debts of the deceased. The pleadings appear to have been in proper shape, and "all persons interested in such estate," including the widow and the children named above, were duly subjected to the jurisdiction of the court by the service of summons. The minor defendants were represented by a guardian ad litem, duly appointed, who filed an answer in their behalf, formally confiding their interests to the protection of the court. The decree of the probate court was duly promulgated, directing a sale of the real estate, described in the complaint as the property in fee simple of the intestate at the time of his death. The sale was duly advertised and consummated. The widow bought the land, paid the purchase price, and received a conveyance therefor from the probate judge of the fee-simple title to the property excepting her dower interest, a life estate in 33 acres, and had the deed recorded. Every legal step necessary appears to have been regularly taken to transfer to the purchaser every interest which the intestate had in the tract of land.

The remaindermen, however, contend that John W. Bradley, the intestate, had only a life interest in the land, and that, although they were parties to the proceeding, they are not now estopped, by the adjudication therein, from setting up their claim to the fee-simple title to said land.

That presents a very interesting question, to which I have given my most earnest consideration, realizing the far-reaching effect of this decision upon titles depending upon such proceedings as this in the probate court.

There is much in this case of a sentimental nature calculated to affect the judgment of a court in its interpretation of the cold principles of the law. The court is naturally reluctant, if it can possibly be avoided consistent with the settled principles, to sanction the destruction of the rights of the remaindermen, certainly vested upon the death of the life tenant, by a proceeding blunderingly consummated in violation of these rights. For fear that such considerations might affect my judgment, I shall first discuss the effect of the probate court proceedings as if an entire stranger had become the purchaser of the land for a full price.

It is of the utmost importance that the faith of the people in the efficacy of titles under judicial sales shall not be shaken. The courts owe it to themselves as the guardians of the law that this shall not lightly be. It is of greater moment than relief from an isolated instance of hardship.

If it be the law that the probate court has no power to do anything but sell the interest of the intestate in the real estate described in the petition, that it has no power to entertain an issue of title affecting that real estate, and that those who come and who are brought into that court alleging and admitting title in the intestate may afterwards repudiate the adjudication and recover upon their own title, we may have this instance presented: John Doe owns a life estate only in a tract of land. He dies owing debts which his personal assets are insufficient to pay. He leaves a widow and children all of age. One of his sons is appointed administrator of his estate. He brings an action in the probate court for the sale of the land, alleging that his father owned the fee-simple title thereto. The widow and the children are made parties defendant. They answer, admitting all of the allegations of the petition, including the allegation that the father owned the land in fee simple and join in the prayer of the petition. The decree of sale is made. The sale is had, and Richard Roe purchases for a full price, pays his money, takes his deed, and records it. The proceeds of sale are applied to the debts of the intestate. The children who were in fact the remaindermen of the estate after the falling in of the life estate of the father come into court, repudiate their answers, repudiate the solemn adjudication of the court, repudiate its conveyance, claim that the court only sold the interest of the life tenant, which of course at his death was nothing, and recover the land from the innocent purchaser, for value, who relied upon their solemn admission and the judgment of a lawful court.

So far as the validity of the probate court decree is concerned, it does not make a particle of difference that there was no answer filed by the adult defendants, or that five of them were minors answering by guardian ad litem. They were all served, properly before the court, and its judgment in the matter confided to it was the solemn act of the law, if within the purview of its jurisdiction.

That the probate court had jurisdiction to try in the first instance the issue of title which might have been raised, is conclusively shown by the case of Gregory v. Rhoden, 24 S. C. 90. There the court says (construing the very section of the Code which gives the power of sale):

"It seems to us that in such cases this provision necessarily gives the right to determine, at least in the first instance, what is 'the real estate of such person deceased,' subject, of course, to the right of appeal to the court of common pleas, where a trial by jury may, if desired, be demanded. Any other construction would tend to make the whole jurisdiction nugatory."

The case of Faust v. Bailey, 5 Rich. 107, involved the question here presented. Although it was an action for partition in the old court of ordinary, the disposition of the question is interesting and fairly apposite to this discussion. It was there held that, where one of the parties to the action claims adverse title in himself, the ordinary had jurisdiction to decide the issue of title. It was contended that the court of ordinary did not possess either the jurisdiction or the machinery to try the issue, but the court held otherwise, that it was the duty of the court of ordinary, in the first instance, to decide that as well as all other issues in the case; that the right of trial by jury upon the issue of the title was preserved by appeal to the court of common pleas where it could be demanded. The court reaffirms the decision in the case of Gates v. Irick, 2 Rich. 593, where it was held that, where one of the parties in partition claims the exclusive title to the property, "the ordinary must decide upon the title." "He is considered to be competent to decide all questions of law and fact which, in the cases within his jurisdiction, are involved in the main inquiries: Shall partition be made between these parties? How? And in what proportion? The title to land is necessarily involved in every such case, whether the decision be made upon default or after contest had." The court further held that the right of trial by jury upon the issue of title was preserved by appeal.

The appellant contends that the case of McLaurin v. Rion, 24 S. C. 407, is conclusive of the position assumed by them that the sale carried only the interest of John W. Bradley, which was nothing, and that they are not bound by the adjudication of their title. That case is complicated and abounds with differentiating circumstances. It appears to me that the intimation of the court (it is not a decision to that effect) that, if the probate court had ordered the land sold as the property of one person, where certain of the parties before him were claiming it as the property of another, the sale would have carried only the interest of the first person, and that the adverse interests would not have been concluded, is based upon the assumption that the proceeding was one in rem, and that no parties were necessary; an assumption which is directly opposed to the section of the Code and to the case of Gregory v. Rhoden, in the same volume, p. 90, in which the opinion was written by the same learned judge. If the case requires interested parties to be before the court and the foregoing decisions justify the conclusion that the probate court was authorized to entertain the issue of title, and if the decisions to be cited hold that, if the adverse interests are not set up, they are waived, it is difficult to see how the proceeding can be considered one in rem. 23 Cyc. 1406.

I am convinced by the foregoing authorities that the probate court had the authority to try the issue of title between the estate of John W. Bradley and the appellants, who were parties to that action, that it was their duty to set up their title in that proceeding, that an adjudication of sale was an adjudication of title in John W. Bradley, and will endeavor to show that by not setting it up they are now estopped from claiming it.

I may say at the outset of this discussion that, while most heartily approving the declaration of this court cited in the opinion prepared by Justice Watts, in reference to the duties of a guardian ad litem, particularly in the Schaefer Case, I do not think they are pertinent to the main question under discussion, for the reason that, whatever may have been the delinquencies of the guardian ad litem in the probate proceedings, they cannot be inquired into in a collateral attack upon the judgment rendered therein.

We have here the possession by Mrs. Bradley of the land from 1877 to 1910, 33 years; a deed from the probate judge to her of the fee-simple title, duly recorded in 1877; a sale by the proper officer after due advertisement; a decree of a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter; all the persons interested in the estate parties to the action duly served, and guardian ad litem appointed and answering; a complaint alleging ownership in fee simple by the intestate.

We next have an action commenced in 1918, 41 years after the sale and 8 years after the death of Mrs. Bradley, by the persons who were parties to the probate proceeding, claiming that John W. Bradley did not own the fee-simple title and that it is in them.

The main question is: "Are they bound by the adjudication in the probate proceedings?"

In Ruff v. Doty, 26 S. C. 178, 1 S. E. 707, 4 Am. St. Rep. 709, the court quotes with approval the following from Freeman on Judgments:

"An adjudication is final and conclusive, not only as to the matter actually determined, but as to any matter which the parties might have litigated, and had decided as incident to or essentially connected with the subject matter of the litigation, and every matter coming within the legitimate province of the original action, both of claim and defense"

—approved in Ryan v. Association, 50 S. C. 185, 27 S. E. 618, 62 Am. St. Rep. 831. See also, 23 Cyc. 1295; McDowall v. McDowall, Bailey, Eq. 324; Kenner v. Caldwell, Bailey, Eq. 149, 21 Am. Dec. 538; Faust v. Faust, 31 S. C. 576, 10 S. E. 262.

We have seen by the authorities above cited that the probate court had jurisdiction in the first instance to determine the question of title; that it was the duty of that court to do so should the issue be raised; that the question of the intestate's title was necessarily involved in the proceeding; and that it was the duty of the adverse claimants to set up their title in that proceeding.

In Haddon v. Lenhardt, 54 S. C. 88, 31 S. E. 883, the widow and children of the intestate had a homestead interest in his land. An action was instituted in the probate court to sell the land in aid of the personalty to pay debts. The widow and children were parties to that proceeding. A decree of sale was made and the sale had; the defendant became purchaser and received a conveyance from the probate judge. The widow and children then had their homestead laid off and brought suit to recover the land. The court refused to allow a recovery, saying:

"We are unable to see why persons who are made parties to an action are not as fully concluded by a judgment the necessary effect of which is to destroy their right of homestead as they would be in any other case."

The precise point had been decided by the court in Culler v. Crim, 52 S. C. 574, 30 S. E. 635, where the court said:

"The order of the probate court to sell the land in aid of assets was binding upon all who were made parties to that proceeding. The necessary effect of that order was to destroy the right of the parties to that proceeding to claim the homestead in the land ordered to be sold."

If the decree would be conclusive upon a right guaranteed by the Constitution, it is difficult to see why it would not be conclusive upon a title which accrued by virtue of a will. See the dissenting opinion of Chief Justice McIver in McMaster v. Arthur, 33 S. C. 512, 12 S. E. 808, where he announces the same principle, but felt bound by the case of Ex parte Strobel, 2 S. C. 309, which latter case is expressly overruled in Hadden v. Lenhardt, supra. See Miller v. Sherry, 2 Wall. 237, 17 L. Ed. 827.

In Gates v. Irick, 2 Rich. 596, it is held that, the ordinary having the power to decide the issue of the title raised by one of the parties in partition, his adjudication of sale is conclusive upon the party raising this issue, although the ordinary expressly declared in his decree that the rights of such adverse claimant should not be affected by the decree. The court says:

"No stronger cause against a partition could be shown than an exclusive title in one of the persons summoned. If this, or any other sufficient cause which might have been shown, be neglected by a person summoned, where the applicant makes those circumstances appear which are essential to the jurisdiction of the Ordinary, the rule is applicable to this which necessarily applies to all other judicial proceedings—matters which might have been investigated must be taken to have been adjudicated no less than those which were investigated."

In Faust v. Bailey, 5 Rich. 107, the above case is reaffirmed, the court declaring:

"When called upon to show cause why partition should not be made, though it might be a suit involving his title to the land, yet, failing to make his defense at the proper time, such a judgment, I submit, would conclude him. * * * As a judgment between the parties upon the same subject-matter, if it did not constitute a bar to such a claim, everything appertaining to such titles may be regarded as unsettled and uncertain."

In Smith v. Smith, Rice, 232, the precise point was decided as in the two preceding cases. The court declares:

"The defendant here, when served with the summons, had the opportunity of setting up his title and making his full defense. He was called upon to show cause why the partition should not be made of the premises, as the estate of Jesse Smith, deceased. It was a suit involving his title to the land, and he cannot be allowed to make now the defense which he omitted to make then. The order for the sale is conclusive, as the judgment of a court upon the same subject-matter and between the same parties."

In Jefferies v. Allen, 34 S. C. 189, 13 S. E. 365, the court says:

"This 82-acre tract of land constituted a part of a tract which, in fact, belonged to Harriet Allen, and not to her husband; but inasmuch as she had assented to, or rather acquiesced in, an order of sale of this land as a part of the estate of her husband, and all of it except the 82 acres had been sold as such, it had been previously adjudged in these proceedings that Harriet Allen was estopped from claiming the said tract of land as her separate estate."

In Bulow v. Witte, 8 S. C. 308, the court held:

"If we stretch the obligation of purchasers at judicial sales beyond the mere duty of ascertaining whether the court had jurisdiction in the matter in which it claimed to act, and whether all the parties to be bound are before it, in the language of Lord Redesdale in Bennett v. Hamill, 2 S. & L. 577, 'we shall introduce doubt on sales under the authority of the Court, which would be highly mischievous.' Something is certainly due to the purchasers at these sales from the confidence which the public reposes in the judgments of the courts of the country. They must be upheld, at least so far as they operate on the title of parties to the proceeding, and if the title, though of infants, is thus alienated by the sale, the conveyance of the officers of the court operates as an estoppel to the same extent, and in the same manner that the proper deed of an adult conveying his title would bar him from asserting it against the grantee"

—approved in Trapier v. Waldo, 16 S. C. 282.

In Trapier v. Waldo, 16 S. C. 276, it is held:

"It is well settled that a purchaser at a judicial sale is bound to make inquiry as to the jurisdiction of the Court which ordered the sale, and whether all proper parties were before it, but beyond that he is in no way responsible for irregularities in the proceeding."

See, also, Lyles v. Haskell, 35 S. C. 391, 14 S. E. 829.

It would be remarkable that purchasers at probate sales only be required to investigate possible adverse claims by parties to the proceeding.

It follows inevitably that the remaindermen, having been properly made parties to the proceeding, and having failed to set up their adverse claim to the land, are bound by the decree ordering the land to be sold as the property in fee simple of John W. Bradley.

Notwithstanding the conclusion that the legal title to this property was in Mrs. Bradley, the important inquiry remains to be determined whether or not by her conduct she became the trustee of a constructive trust in the property for the benefit of the remaindermen.

The case of Sullivan v. Latimer, 35 S. C. 422, 14 S. E. 933, cited by Mr. Justice Watts, is clear upon the question, and it is possible that the remaindermen may upon trial of the equitable issues bring themselves within the principle of that case, as to which no opinion is expressed.

If they should be able to establish a constructive trust in the land, the defendant would be entitled to show in reply that the trust was dissipated by such unequivocal acts on the part of Mrs. Bradley, repudiating the trust as would give a starting point to adverse possession, the statute of limitations, or the presumption of a grant, which, if continued for a sufficient length of time and under the circumstances required by the law, would perfect her title.

It is to be regretted that the verdict upon the legal issue of title was not followed up by a decree settling the equitable issues as well, in which event this court would have been in a position to determine the whole case and end the controversy. As it is, this appeal is not from any judgment of the court, but from a verdict upon the legal issue of title.

In my opinion the verdict upon the legal issue of title was rightly directed in favor of the defendant, and that the case should be remanded to the circuit court for the determination of the equitable issues in the case.

NEWTON et al. v. McLAURIN. (No. 10605.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 13, 1921.)

1. Wills \Rightarrow 524(6)—Income on hand at life tenant's death held to go as provided for surplus income, and not to remaindermen.

Under a will giving property to two daughters of the testatrix for life, and providing that if the income should exceed enough to comfortably support them, or if one of them died, or married, the excess or surplus should be equally divided among the other living children, and that if either died or married the other should have the use of so much of the estate as was necessary to support her, any balance of the income coming into the hands of the surviving life tenant's executor should be distributed among the living brothers and sisters to the exclusion of the heirs or assignees of deceased brothers and sisters entitled to share in the remainder.

2. Wills \Rightarrow 564(3)—Rent for year in which life tenant died held to go as provided for surplus income.

Under a will giving property to two daughters of the testatrix for life and providing that any surplus income beyond what was needed for their comfortable support should be divided among the other living children, where the surviving life tenant had leased land for the year in which she died, taking a note maturing after her death, such rent was income to be paid to the living brothers and sisters.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. Elizabeth Newton and others against Julian G. McLaurin, administrator, with the will annexed of Mary Gibson, deceased. From a decree construing the will favorably to the petitioners, the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Mary Gibson died many years ago, leaving certain real estate, and sons and daughters, some of whom are parties hereto. She also left a will, which is copied in the case. Penelope Gibson outlived Miranda Gibson, dying March 8, 1917, neither of them having married. After her death, as stated in the complaint, the respondents and others, heirs at law of the testatrix, brought suit for the sale of the land and the division of the proceeds among them and the other heirs of the testatrix and their assigns, which was accordingly granted by the court. The land had, however, before the death of Penelope, been rented out for 1917, the lessee having given the appellant a note for the rent, due November, 1917, in the amount of $1,900, which was paid at maturity. The funds in the hands of the administrator at the death of Penelope Gibson, and received by him after that time, are correctly stated in the return of the respondent. As appears from the returns filed by the administrator, his commissions of $95 were taken from the gross sum in his hands, as were also the taxes on the land, which would amount to $33.06, and stamps on deed, amounting to $29.

The question was whether the surviving brothers and sisters of Penelope Gibson would take all of the funds, including the entire rent for 1917, or whether the remaindermen and their assigns (among whom were, of course, such survivors) would take the proportionate part of the rent for 1917 determined by the time of the death of Penelope Gibson. The case was heard by Hon. Edward McIver, circuit judge, by consent, on a rule issued against the appellant. Due notice of intention to appeal was given.

The following is the will of Mary Gibson:

State of South Carolina, Marlborough County.

Know all men by these presents that I Mary Gibson of the state and county aforesaid being weak and feeble but of perfect mind and memory do make and ordain this my last will and testament in the manner and form as follows, viz:—1st. after all my just debts are paid I will and bequeath to my daughters Miranda Gibson and Penelope Gibson the use of all my property both real and personal during their natural lives, provided they never marry. If both my daughters should marry, whose names are above written, it is my will that my estate both real and personal be equally divided between my children and the heirs of their body share and share alike. It is my will that should the income from my estate exceed enough to comfortably support my daughters Miranda Gibson and Penelope Gibson or one of them, should one of them die or marry the said excess or surplus I will to be equally divided among the rest of my children then living, it is my will that if either of my daughters Miranda Gibson or Penelope Gibson should die or marry the remaining single one have the use of my estate or so much of it as is necessary to support her during her natural life provided she remain single. I do hereby appoint my trusty friend and nephew Raiford Gibson executor to this my last will and testament, hoping and confiding in him that he will carry the same into effect according to the intent and meaning. This 23d day of June in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven.

The following is the circuit court decree:

[1] The above-stated matter comes on to be heard before me by agreement of all parties. The right of either party to have the same heard by Judge Townsend, who issued the rule, being expressly waived. After due consideration of the petition and the return thereto and full argument by counsel for both sides, I am clearly of the opinion that it was the intention of the testatrix, Mary Gibson, that all income accruing from her estate should be applied primarily to the comfortable support and maintenance of her two daughters, Miranda and Penelope, during the lifetime of the survivors, and that any balance of the fund coming into the hands of the executor or his successors for that purpose should upon the death of the survivor of the two be distributed among their surviving brothers and sisters to the exclusion of the heirs at law or assignees of those brothers and sisters who predeceased Penelope, the survivor of the two prime beneficiaries.

[2] I hold that the rent which was paid or secured to the executor for the year 1917 was income in the hands of said executor dedicated by the terms of the will to the support and maintenance of Miranda and Penelope, and that the same, together with any balance from previous years, must be distributed among the petitioners, the four surviving brothers and sisters, pro rata, in accordance with the plain direction of the will, and it is so ordered, adjudged and decreed.

McColl & Stevensen, of Bennettsville, for appellant.

Townsend & Rogers, of Bennettsville, for respondents.

WATTS, J. For the reasons assigned by Hon. Edward McIver, circuit judge, it is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and FRASER, J., concur.

GARY, C. J. (concurring). Sections 3633 and 3634 of the Code of Laws 1912, are as follows:

3633. "If any person shall die after the first day of March in any year, the crop on the lands which were in the occupation of the deceased shall be assets in the executors' or administrators' hands, subject to debts, legacies, and distribution, the taxes and expenses of cultivation of such crop being first paid."

3634. "The emblements of such lands which shall be severed before the last day of December following, shall, in like manner, be assets in the hands of the executors or administrators; but all such emblements growing on the lands on that day, or at the time of the testator's or intestate's death, if that happens after the said last day of December and before the first day of March, shall pass with the lands."

The will of Mary Gibson provides that—

"After all my just debts are paid, I will and bequeath to my daughters, Miranda Gibson and Penelope Gibson, the use of all my property, both real and personal, during their natural lives."

This provision of the will, standing alone, shows that as Penelope died after the 1st day of March, 1917, the crops of that year belonged to her and did not pass with the land. Newton v. Odom, 67 S. C. 1, 45 S. E. 105. But the foregoing must be construed with the following provision:

"It is my will, that should the income of my estate exceed enough to comfortably support my daughters Miranda Gibson and Penelope Gibson, or one of them, should one of them die or marry, the said excess or surplus I will to be equally divided among the rest of my children, then living."

As Penelope died after the 1st day of March, 1917, she had an interest, in the crops of that year, to the extent of a comfortable support, until her death. Having reached this conclusion, it necessarily follows that the excess, or surplus income of 1917, must be equally divided among the children of the testatrix living at the time of Penelope's death.

It cannot be successfully contended, that there was not a surplus, or excess, of income in 1917, on the ground that the income of previous years, in the hands of the administrator at the time of Penelope's death, rendered unnecessary a resort to the rents collected in 1917 for the comfortable support of Penelope. The answer of the defendant relative to this question is as follows:

"Since the death of the said Miss Penelope Gibson, by reason of this suit and the cost of the burial expenses, and other accounts for supplies and merchandise furnished her, he has paid out the sum of $1,167.65. That if this is charged against the amount which was on hand at the time of the death of the said Miss Penelope Gibson, there is left the sum of $316.68, and respondent is informed, and believes, that the major portion of the amount on hand with him is income which has arisen since the death of Miss Penelope Gibson, and to which it is contended she had no right, but under the will it goes to the owners of the soil from which it was accrued, and that the only part of the rent paid for the year 1917, that would be applicable as income accrued during the life of Miss Penelope Gibson would be such proportionate part of the entire rent as the period of the year before March 8th bears to the whole year, and that the relators and the surviving brother mentioned in the said proceedings are not entitled to take over the fund on hand with him, to the exclusion of the other children of the testatrix, their heirs or assigns."

The words which we have italicized show that the defendant does not dispute the fact that Penelope was entitled to a part of the income of 1917. Therefore, under the express provisions of the will, the children of the testatrix living at the time of Penelope's death were entitled to the surplus income of that year. Furthermore, the $316.68 hereinbefore mentioned represented the surplus or excess of income during previous years, and was not applicable to the debts of Penelope, but those of the children of the testatrix living at Penelope's death were entitled to it.

For these reasons, I concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice WATTS.

COTHRAN, J. I do not concur in the conclusion arrived at by a majority of the court for the following reasons:

Mary Gibson, late of Marlboro county, died some years ago, leaving a will by which she devised to her two unmarried daughters, Miranda and Penelope—

"the use of all my property, both real and personal, during their natural lives, provided they never marry."

The will further provided that if either of these daughters should die the survivor should—"have the use of my estate or so much of it as is necessary to support her during her natural life, provided she remain single."

It is further provided that should the income from the estate be more than enough to comfortably support the daughters, or the survivor, under the conditions named above—

"The said excess or surplus I will to be equally divided among the rest of my children then living."

The executor is charged by the will with the duty of carrying it into effect according to its intent and meaning. The daughter Miranda predeceased Penelope, and the latter died on March 8, 1917. At that time the administrator had on hand from the income of the estate the sum of $1,484.33, of which he applied $1,167.55, to a judgment and other expenses incurred on account of the support of Penelope, leaving in his hands $316.68 as a surplus, distributable under the will.

After the death of Penelope, the lands and personal property were partitioned among the heirs, without reference to the deaths of certain of the children prior to the death of Penelope. In November, 1917, the administrator collected $1,900 on account of rent of the lands for the year 1917, a note therefor having been given by the tenant to the administrator in the early part of that year for that amount. At the death of Penelope there were four living children of the testatrix; several of the children, neither the names nor number being set out in the case predeceased Penelope some of whom it appears have assigned their interests in the estate to strangers. One of the four children is not made a party to this proceeding; none of the heirs or assignees of those who died before Penelope are made parties. The matter comes up upon a petition by the respondents in this appeal and the return of the administrator to a rule to show cause, setting up the claims of the representatives in interest of the children who predeceased Penelope, and as stated in the circuit decree, was heard "by agreement of all parties."

I assume that the petition was filed in the court of common pleas.

Unless this court is prepared to render a decision in favor of the representatives of the children who predeceased Penelope, simply for the guidance of the administrator, assuming that they will not object to a decision in their favor, it seems to me that it is but "rolling empty barrels about" to attempt to conclude the interests of parties not before the court. The relators as they are styled, three of the four living children, contend that they are entitled each to one-fourth of the $316.68, the surplus above referred to (as to which there appears to be no contest) and also to the same proportion of the $1,900 rent of 1917. The administrator suggests that they are not so entitled, "to the exclusion of the other children of the testatrix, their heirs and assigns." In other words, the point at issue is whether the $1,900 rent of 1917 should be considered a part of the surplus of income after providing for the support of Penelope and distributable as such under the will to the four living children or as intestate property of the estate, distributable to all the heirs.

In view of the provisions of the will, and of the death of the daughter Miranda, Penelope surviving, the devise may be considered as in this form:

"I devise to my daughter Penelope the use of all of my property, both real and personal, or so much of it as may be necessary to support her during her natural life; the surplus from the income of which shall be divided equally among the rest of my children then living."

It seems to me that the bare statement of this provision is a sufficient demonstration of the conclusion that Penelope did not take a life estate in the property of the testatrix, but that it was simply a charge upon the property for her comfortable support; that this charge was fully satisfied when, as it appears, there was at her death in the administrator's hands a surplus of $316.68, over and above what was required for her comfortable support, and that what income was received after that time belonged to the estate, and was distributable as interstate property. Jackson v. Jackson, 56 S. C. 346, 33 S. E. 749.

Upon the death of Penelope there was already a surplus of income over expenditures; that income subsequently received could scarcely be considered surplus when no part of it was needed for her support and five-sixths of it was earned after her death.

SIMS v. ELEAZER et al. (No. 10607.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 13, 1921.)

1. Highways \S 175(1)—Statute does not require vehicle to keep to right when not meeting others.

The statute requiring a vehicle in meeting and passing another vehicle to keep to the right does not require a person to keep on the right side of the road at all times, but only to avoid interference with some one coming from the opposite direction.

2. Highways \S 175(1)—Driver must violate traffic rules if necessary to avoid collision.

Where a collision with a person who is violating the traffic rules is imminent, a vehicle driver must exercise due care such as an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under similar circumstances to avoid causing the injury, even though to do so he must technically violate a traffic rule, provided in so doing he does not injure any one who is traveling where he has a right to be.

3. Highways \S 184(3)—Fact that defendant driver was on left side does not conclusively show negligence and freedom from contributory negligence as matter of law.

The fact that the driver of a vehicle was traveling on the left side of the road at the time of collision does not conclusively show his negligence as a matter of law, but only raises the presumption in favor of the man traveling on the right side of the road, nor does that fact show as a matter of law that the other person is free from contributory negligence, but all the circumstances in evidence explanatory of the situation are to be considered in determining whether the position of the parties is capable of explanation.

4. Trial \S 252(8)—Correct requested instruction properly refused if not applicable to facts.

In an action for the death of a pedestrian struck by an automobile, it was not error to refuse a requested instruction directly stating the statute regulating the speed of vehicles under certain conditions, where that statute was not applicable to the facts.

Fraser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Action by J. G. Sims, as administrator of the estate of Laura Bell Sims, against W. P. Eleazer and J. Albert Eleazer. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff's sixth exception was to the refusal of the court to give his second request to charge that—

"The laws of this state require a party operating a motor vehicle, upon approaching a crossing of intersecting public highways, or a bridge, or a sharp curve, or a steep descent, to have his machine under control and operating at a rate of speed no greater than six miles an hour, and in no event greater than is reasonable and proper, and having regard to the traffic then on the highway and the safety of the public."

In refusing the charge, the judge stated:

"I do not charge the second request, although it is good law—practically just a copy of the statute; still I do not think it is applicable to this case."

The eighth exception was to the denial of plaintiff's motion for a new trial based on grounds raised by exceptions 1-6.

The evidence showed that plaintiff's intestate started on foot across the highway from the gate in front of her home and was struck by defendant's car, which was proceeding up a slight grade.

D. W. Robinson, of Columbia, for appellant.

C. S. Montelth and Nettles & Tobias, all of Columbia, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This was an action for damages for the negligent, willful, and wanton killing of the plaintiff's intestate by an automobile driven by the defendants. The cause was tried before his honor Judge Edward McIver and a jury at the February term of court, 1920, for Richland county, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the defendants, upon which judgment was entered, and plaintiff appeals.

Exceptions 1, 7, and 9 raise the contention that his honor was in error in not directing a verdict for the plaintiff as asked for; that from all the evidence adduced at the trial no inference could be drawn of unavoidable accident, or no negligence on the part of the defendant, or of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff's intestate.

[1] The plaintiff's contention is that the automobile, at the time of the accident, was on the left side of the road, where it had no right to be, under the statute law of this state defining how the traveling public shall travel on the highways of the state, and that the automobile was not under control.

The wording of the statute does not require that in meeting and passing another a vehicle shall keep to the right. The statute does not contemplate that at all times a person traveling shall strictly comply with the terms of the statute. A person traveling a highway has the right to travel on either side of the road when no one is coming in the opposite direction, and he does not interfere with the traveling of another coming from the opposite direction, and in no manner impedes or obstructs the rights of others coming from an opposite direction. If he is meeting and passing, he must bear to the right and comply with the terms of the statute. In passing any one in front of him going in the same direction, he must pass him on the left, giving the one in front of him the benefit of bearing to the right. Any one passing him going in the same direction must pass on his left.

[2] While these are the general rules that must be observed, yet, if any one, even though violating the rules of traffic, is about to be injured, in person or property, by a collision between them, he must exercise due care, such as an ordinary prudent person would exercise under similar circumstances, to avoid injury to any one, even though he violate the traffic rules, provided in so doing he does not injure any one being where they have a right to be under the law regulating traveling.

If a person traveling in the manner provided for by law meets any one traveling in a manner in violation of the statute and sees a collision is inevitable, unless he violates the rule, and by a violation of it he can avoid a collision without danger to himself or property, he must do so, even though he technically violate the law. He must exercise the ordinary instincts of human nature to avoid being injured or inflicting injury on another. He must exercise the ordinary care that an ordinary person would exercise under similar circumstances of the case.

[3] A person, being on the wrong side of the road, cannot, as a matter of law, be injured by one traveling on the right side of the road. This only raises a presumption in favor of the man traveling on the right side of the road, and being where he had a right to be, that he did not intend to injure the other. Neither can it be said that a person, being on the wrong side of the road, and injuring another, as a matter of law is absolutely liable. While it raises a strong presumption of law that he is, it does not as a matter of law make him absolutely liable. It depends upon all of the facts and circumstances of the situation at that particular time, the positions of each, whether on the right or wrong side of the road, whether the circumstances are capable of explanation. There were circumstances detailed in evidence explanatory of the situation at the time of the unfortunate killing, of the automobile being on the wrong side of the road, and that it was under control, sufficient to carry the case to the jury, and we see no error in his honor's failing to direct a verdict for the plaintiff, and these exceptions are overruled.

Exceptions 2, 3, and 4 are overruled. His honor's charge, as a whole is a complete exposition of the law applicable to the case, and nowhere did he commit any error that was at all prejudicial to the appellant.

Exception 5 complains of error in charging the law of contributory negligence. The answer set it up as a defense. There was testimony along that line, and it was a proper issue to be left to the jury. We see no error as complained of, and these exceptions are overruled.

[4] Exceptions 6 and 8 are overruled for the reasons stated by his honor. All exceptions are overruled, and judgment affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and COTHRAN, J., concur.

FRASER, J. I dissented in Walker v. Lee, 106 S. E. 682, but this case goes further than Walker v. Lee, and I dissent again.

A "libel per se" is one actionable on its face; a "libel per quod" is one not actionable upon its face, but which becomes so by reason of the peculiar situation or occasion upon which the words are spoken or written.

5. Libel and slander \S 48(1)—Fair criticism of juror's work, without attacking character, reputation, or motives, is not defamation.

While jurors performing their duty are entitled to full protection from unwarranted attacks upon their character, reputation, or motives by persons disgruntled or dissatisfied by any verdict, yet fair and just criticism of their work in discharge of duty is in the interest of the administration of justice and of sound public policy, and when such criticism is fair and just and confined to their work, and does not attack their moral character or integrity, there is no defamation.

6. Libel and slander ¶123(8)—When criticisms of jurors cease to be fair and honest and become libelous is usually a jury question.

The question whether criticisms and statements about jury men ceased to be fair and honest and become libelous is usually a question for the jury, and can rarely, though occasionally, be decided on a demurrer.

7. Libel and slander ¶42(1), 81—Publication regarding jury's action held not libelous, and complaint held to state no cause of action.

A published article, alleged to cast aspersions on the verdict of a jury, signed by several citizens for the announced purpose of giving the public the facts in a prosecution for violation of the Sunday law, held not libelous per se, and, where the complaint failed to allege any extrinsic matter making the publication libelous, no cause of action was stated.

8. Libel and slander ¶42(1)—Statement that plaintiffs were "outlaws" construed to mean only that they were violating Sunday law.

A published account of a criminal trial for violation of Sunday closing law, containing a statement of a witness that plaintiffs were outlaws, an outlaw being one excluded from the benefits of the law and deprived of its protection, which, while standing alone, might be libel per se, held, in connection with the account of the trial, to mean no more than that plaintiffs were violating the law, and not to constitute libel.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Out-law.]

9. Libel and slander ¶38(4)—Testimony of a party held privileged.

The testimony by defendant in a libel suit, when a witness in a criminal prosecution and on cross-examination, was privileged.

10. Libel and slander ¶42(1)—A private individual may publish court proceedings.

A private individual has the same right as a newspaper to publish the proceedings of courts, but such report must be accurate, fair, and impartial, not garbled, added to, or taken from, nor used to injure the reputation or business of another.

11. Libel and slander ¶51(3)—Publication of court proceedings over party's objection not malicious libel.

If defendants, in an action for libel, had a right to publish court proceedings, the fact that defendants published such proceedings over the objection of the plaintiffs is insufficient to fix a charge of malicious libel on the publishers.

12. Libel and slander ¶101(4)—No presumption of malice from the publication of court proceedings over party's objection.

A publication of court proceedings over objection of a party is prima facie not libelous, and there is no presumption of malice therefrom.

13. Libel and slander ¶9(7)—Publication that Red Cross received tainted money from plaintiffs held not libelous.

In a civil action for libel, a publication, alleged to have injured plaintiffs in business and reputation, stating that the Red Cross does not knowingly accept tainted money, held not intended by the signers of the article to charge the plaintiffs with being engaged in any corrupt, reprehensive, or illegal avocation, or contrary to morality, where it stated that plaintiffs had paid the proceeds from business done on Sunday to the Red Cross, and where plaintiffs admit that such money was made or earned contrary to and in violation of Sunday closing law (Cr. Code 1912, §§ 698, 699), there is no cause of action.

14. Sunday ¶7—Sales of ice cream and cigars not work of charity, though profits are given to charity.

Sales of ice cream or cigars are neither a work of necessity nor charity, within Cr. Code 1912, § 698, nor are they excused where the money received therefrom is devoted to Red Cross or other charitable work.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Aiken County; H. F. Rice, Judge.

Actions by L. M. C. Oliveros, by Louis D. Oliveros, and by William Terwilliger against C. K. Henderson for slander and libel. Judgment in each case for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The following is the decree of the trial Judge:

The above-stated causes are actions for slander and libel, instituted by the plaintiff against the defendant Henderson.

In the cases of Terwilliger and Louis D. Oliveros two causes of action are set out. In the other four cases only one cause of action is set out in the complaint.

The matter came before me at the summer term of court for Aiken county, 1920, upon demurrer by the defendant to all the causes of action set out in the complaints, upon the ground that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute causes of action.

In the month of February, 1920, Louis D. Oliveros and William Terwilliger were operating an ice cream parlor and cigar store in the city of Aiken, and were tried before magistrate W. B. Raborn upon a warrant, which complaint alleges was sworn out by C. K. Henderson, charging them with violation of sections 698 and 699 of the Criminal Code of South Carolina.

The case was tried by a jury, and resulted in the acquittal of the defendants. Thereafter, the complaint alleges, there was published in one of the newspapers of the city of Aiken what was purported to be an account of the trial and matters connected therewith. When the cases were called for hearing, it was suggested by counsel for the plaintiffs that the court was disqualified to hear the cases, upon the grounds that the now presiding judge was present at a meeting at the Baptist Church in which the matter of prosecuting the violators of the Sunday law was discussed, and that the court had participated in said discussion and meeting. The said grounds will be more fully disclosed by an affidavit filed along with the record in this case and made by W. M. Smoak, one of the attorneys.

The attorneys for the defendant insisted strenuously that there be no delay in the hearing of the causes, and that there was absolutely no grounds for the claim of the plaintiffs that the presiding judge should declare himself disqualified. As a matter of fact, on the occasion in question the now presiding judge was present at the Baptist Church in the city of Aiken, at one of the regular Sunday services, and, after the usual sermon and other exercises were over, but the congregation still sitting in their seats, and before being dismissed, the matter was brought up by either the minister or some member of the church—exactly who I cannot recall—and the matter was discussed while the presiding judge was sitting in the same seat in which he had listened to the sermon, and it was suggested by one of the deacons of the church that the now presiding judge should serve as a member of a committee to be appointed to look into the matter of the observance of Sunday law in the city of Aiken.

[1] The now presiding judge plainly and unequivocally refused to have his name put upon any such committee, and stated openly and plainly that on account of his official position he could have nothing to do with any such movement. He took no part whatsoever in the discussion, either for or against it, or in any other way.

Neither of the plaintiffs nor the defendant have ever been in any sense intimate with the present presiding judge, nor have any of them been connected with him in business or any other way; all of them are friends of the presiding judge, but none of them no more than any of the others. So far as he can recall, not one of them has ever been in his home, with the exception of Mr. L. M. C. Oliveros, who was there on one or two occasions on business; nor has he, the presiding judge, ever been, so far as he can recall, in the home of any one of the parties to said cause, and he has lived in the city of Aiken now for more than 16 years.

After a full consideration of the whole proposition he felt, and still feels, that there was absolutely nothing in the suggestion that he might be disqualified, and to refuse to hear these demurrers would be to shirk a plain duty which he was under oath to perform, unpleasant though it might be to undertake to decide differences among men all of whom he looks upon as his friends.

I have given this matter considerable study, and have endeavored to apply the law to the cases.

[2] The demurrers admit the facts alleged in the complaint, but do not admit the inferences drawn by plaintiffs from such facts, and it is for the court to determine as to whether or not such inferences are justifiable; that is, to determine if the language used in the publication can fairly or reasonably be construed to have the meaning attributed to it by the plaintiff.

[3] Libelous or slanderous matter, spoken or written, belongs to one of two classes—per se and per quod. In determining whether words are libelous or slanderous, they must be given their ordinary, popular meaning, unless, however, the defendant, at the time such words were used, modifies or explains the meaning which he gives them to mean something other than their ordinary, popular meaning.

[4] A libel per se is one which is actionable on its face. A per quod libel, however, is one not actionable on its face, but becomes so by reason of the peculiar situation or occasion upon which the words are spoken or written.

As stated in 13th Ency. Pleading and Practice, and adopted in Hubbard v. Furman University, 76 S. C. 510, 57 S. E. 478:

"If the alleged defamatory words are not actionable on their face, but derive their defamatory import from extrinsic facts and circumstances, such extrinsic facts and circumstances must be set forth and connected with the words charged by a proper averment."

[5] We will first consider the cause of action of the plaintiffs J. Conrad Dobe, Joseph P. Logan, and Arthur M. Weeks. The publication complained of, and which the said plaintiffs claimed is libelous, is set out, in part at least, in the complaints in the said cause. Dobe, Logan, and Weeks were three of the jurors that tried the aforesaid cause in the magistrate's court. An examination of the publication will show that it can hardly be said that it is a criticism of the conduct of the said jurors. It is certain that nowhere in the said publication is there any direct criticism of these jurors, and certainly no direct charge that they were actuated in any degree by any improper motive in returning the verdict which they did. Therefore, if it can be construed a criticism of their work as jurors, it can be done so only by inference, but if it be construed as a criticism, then the question, which is a very far-reaching, important one, comes squarely up before the court as to whether or not the public has a right to criticize the verdict of a jury.

Jurors do not voluntarily assume their duties, but are required by the law to serve. This being so, there can hardly be two opinions about the proposition that in performing their duty they are entitled to full protection from unwarranted attacks upon their character, reputation, or motives by persons disgruntled or dissatisfied by any verdict which they might render; but are they, by virtue of their positions as jurors, to be held free from all criticisms, no matter how unjustifiable their verdicts may be? I find it impossible for an instant to entertain the affirmative of this proposition. If a circuit judge commits error or does a legal wrong, there is a higher court to set the matter right, but when a petit jury goes wrong by freeing a criminal against all the evidence and the law there is no remedy save by an indignant public opinion, such as may tend to prevent a repetition of such verdict.

I want it distinctly understood at this point that neither directly nor by insinuation do I mean to apply the word "criminal" to either of the young men who were tried in the magistrate's court, nor do I intend any language used above in reference to verdicts of jurors generally to be applied to the verdict rendered by the jury in the magistrate's case above referred to. Young Louis Oliveros I have known practically all of his life and I hold him in the highest regard. Terwilliger I have known for only a short time, but have never heard aught against his character. Fair and just criticism of a juror's work in the discharge of his duty is in the interest of the administration of justice and a sound public policy, and when such criticism is fair and just, then there is no defamation.

As is said in Bearce v. Bass, 88 Me. 521, 34 Atl. 411, 51 Am. St. Rep. 446, quoted in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Watts in the case of Black v. State Company: "So long * * * as the criticism is confined to a man's work, and does not attack the moral character or professional integrity of the individual, and is fair and reasonable, there is no libel because there is no defamation of the man himself. But, when the comments or criticism of a man's work becomes an attack on his private or business character, then the element of malice comes in and stamps the language as libelous."

[6] It may be true, as stated in Black v. State Co., supra, 93 S. C. at page 475, 77 S. E. at page 54 (Ann. Cas. 1914C, 989) that "the question when criticism and statements cease to be fair and honest, and become libelous is usually for the jury and can rarely be decided on demurrer," but in the instant cases I do not think this can apply, and if this be the law with reference to criticism of the verdicts of jurors, then it is dangerous indeed to make any criticism whatsoever upon a juror's work, where the speaker or writer does not approve of it, because, no matter how honest or lacking in malice such criticism or comment may be, any one making any such comments will be liable to an action for slander or libel, and be put to the expense and trouble of defending such action before a jury.

[7] We should not forget, too, as is set out in Mayrant v. Richardson, 1 Nott & McO. 347, 9 Am. Dec. 707. "That freedom of speech is the necessary attribute of every free government."

In the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Watts in Black v. State Company, supra, we find the following taken from MacDonald v. Sun Printing & Publishing Association, 45 Misc. Rep. 441, 92 N. Y. Supp. 37, and I think this language, which was applied to public officers, also applies with equal force to jurors: "The people are not obliged to speak of the conduct of their officials in whispers or in bated breath in a free government, but only in despotism. On the contrary, they have a right to speak out in open discussion and criticism thereof, the only test being that they make no false statement. And this is the great safeguard of free government and of pure government. This is fundamental among us;" and again, "while an officer's public acts may be criticized, the publication must not contain a charge against his person or moral character."

And again in Mayrant v. Richardson, supra, we find the following as to freedom of speech: "That among those principles deemed sacred in America; among those sacred rights considered as forming the bulwark of their liberty, which the government contemplates with awful reverence, and would approach with the most cautious circumspection, there is no one of which the importance is more deeply impressed on the public mind."

Again, 5 A. L. R. page 1852: "The foundation for an action of libel must be that the words are defamatory or bear a defamatory meaning."

In Hubbard v. Furman University, supra, the court says: "If the publication is not libelous per se, bad motive or malicious purpose to injure the plaintiff is not enough without an allegation that it effected the evil purpose by conveying to those to whom it was sent, a charge injuriously affecting the character or business of the plaintiff."

It is true, indeed, as stated by counsel for the plaintiffs on the argument: "That a citizen is as much entitled to the protection of the court for his good name as for his property."

If any difference should be made, it ought to be made in favor of the former; but, while the courts should be prompt in protecting the citizen's good name, they should be careful, also, before proceeding, to be sure that the complaint in an action of this kind does not set out that an attack has been made upon the reputation of such citizen.

The publication in question is as follows:

"To the Citizens of Aiken City and County: "As is well known, some of the citizens of the city have been earnestly striving for a better observance of Sunday, an effort being made to have the laws of the city conform rather than conflict with the laws of the state.

"To this end a committee from the various churches of Aiken appeared before council, which not only refused this petition, but passed an ordinance which only required closing for two hours on Sunday (10:30 a. m. to 12:30). So that the city was more wide open on this day than in the past.

"Consequently, the only course open was an appeal to state law. The law was published in the city and county papers. As a result, all places of business were closed for two succeeding Sundays, and then, in open defiance of the state law, one or two opened up, and continued so to do. After due warning had been given, and disregarded, warrants were issued for one of the firms violating the law, and the case was heard before Magistrate Raborn's court.

"We herewith present the full stenographic report of that trial in order that all the people may know the facts. The defendants admitted the violation of the law, every witness testified to the fact of its violation, and yet in face of all the law and all the evidence the jury brought in a verdict of 'Not guilty.'

"The defendants pleaded that they gave the profits to the Red Cross and exhibited receipts as proof.

"The committee knows full well that the Red Cross, which the people love and to which they gladly contribute with splendid generosity, does not knowingly accept tainted money or money made in their name by violators of the laws, and we believe that all money so received will be returned, if it has not already been returned.

"The defendants made a strong plea of the fact that they kept closed for two hours, 10:30 to 12:30, as provided by city law; but this is wholly foreign to the issue, as the question was state law, and this absolutely forbids business houses opening on Sunday, drug stores excepted, and that only for sale of medicine to relieve sick and suffering humanity.

"In conclusion * * *

"In view of the law and clear, undisputed evidence, and the admissions of the defendants that they had violated it, does it not seem strange that this jury (of which this plaintiff was a member) should bring in a verdict against all the law and all the evidence—a verdict of 'Not guilty'?"

"Let the people of our city and county read the record of this trial, form themselves into a jury, and render a verdict in accordance with the law and the evidence. [Signed] C. K. Henderson. Dr. H. H. Wyman, Sr. Rev. O. M. Abney. Rev. P. J. McLean. Rev. John E. Henderson. Rev. John Ridout. G. Cushman. J. T. Shuler. W. E. Shuler. E. C. Cushman. I. N. Eubanks. C. L. Holley. D. M. George. E. L. Shealey. J. E. Seigler. J. Milton Allen. G. E. Owens. E. C. Barrett."

Applying the foregoing principles to the cases of the three jurors, a bare inspection of the complaint is sufficient to show that the publication is not libelous per se. There is no "charge injuriously affecting the character or business of the plaintiff."

The said report of the proceedings purports to be full and complete, and neither in the argument nor elsewhere was it charged by the plaintiff that such report is unfair, garbled, added to, or taken from. The expressed purpose of such publication was that "all the people may know the facts." The complaints show that defendant, along with 17 other citizens of the city of Aiken, signed the publication. A fair and reasonable construction of such publication reveals the fact that the signers thought that the defendants in the said trial should have been convicted. But nowhere do they say that any member of the jury returned a dishonest verdict, or that any moral turpitude of any sort prompted their action.

It is true that the plaintiffs have seen fit to construe said publication as charging them with almost every manner and form of moral obliquity described in five subsections of paragraph 9 of the complaint by a battery of adverbs, but these are only the inferences of the pleader, and they are not such inferences as are fairly and reasonably deducible from the language used. Neither do the pleadings set out any facts outside of the publication which would make the same libelous. The Code does not in the latter case relieve the pleader from setting out the facts which he relies upon to make a cause of libel when there is no libel per se. Hubbard v. Furman University, supra, 76 S. C. 512, 57 S. E. 478.

There is therefore no cause of libel or slander, either per se or per quod, set out in the complaints, and the demurrers in each of these cases are sustained, and the complaints dismissed; and it is so ordered.

The plaintiffs, Louis D. Oliveros and William Terwilliger, each sued on two causes of action. In their first cause of action they say that each of them were branded as an outlaw by defendant publishing in a newspaper the account of the trial in the magistrate's court, or at least a part of it set out in the complaint, and that said statement of defendant published was given while a witness in said trial.

[8] It will be observed from an examination of the complaint that this suit is not based upon defendant's statement on the street, but upon the statement made while a witness, and the subsequent publication of such evidence in a newspaper published in the city of Aiken.

The suit of L. M. C. Oliveros has for its basis the same statement charged against the defendant, and made at the same time, so that the first cause of action in the Louis D. Oliveros and William Terwilliger cases and the one and only cause of action in the L. M. C. Oliveros case will be considered and determined together.

The publication complained of, as set out in the complaint, is of considerable length and need not be set out here. It purports to be a stenographic report of the evidence taken at the trial heretofore mentioned. Nowhere has it been charged, either in the argument or in the complaint, that so much of it as is set out in said complaint is unfair, garbled, added to, or taken from. It must be assumed, therefore, that as it appears in the complaint the said publication referred to, so far as it goes, is an accurate account of what took place in the magistrate's court.

The portion of the proceedings referred to above disclose the fact that defendant, upon the insistent cross-examination of counsel, did make the statement referred to. The plaintiffs deny such statements as false, and a willful, malicious, wanton, etc., defamation of plaintiffs. Webster's New International Dictionary defines outlaw to mean: "A person excluded from the benefits of the law or deprived of its protection." Standing alone and unexplained, such charge might be a libel per se, but no reasonable person, it seems to me, can read the account of the trial as set out in the evidence, made a part of the complaint, and say that defendant meant any more than to charge that plaintiffs were violating the law by opening their place of business and selling goods on Sunday.

[9, 10] I do not deem it necessary to quote authority for the proposition that what was said by defendant as a witness, and on a cross-examination by the counsel for the then defendants, was privileged. As I recall, this was admitted by counsel for the plaintiffs, and it only remains to discuss the point as to whether a later publication of the testimony taken at the trial was also privileged. There is a great deal of authority on this subject. It seems to be settled beyond question that a private individual has the same right as a newspaper to publish the proceedings of courts—no more and no less. All the authorities seem to agree, also, that either an individual or a newspaper has the right, with some exceptions, to publish the proceedings of our courts of justice. "The reason for this rule is that the public have a right to know what takes place in a court of justice, and unless the proceedings are of an immoral, blasphemous or indecent character, or accompanied with defamatory comments, the publication is privileged." Judge Freeman in Holmes v. Clisby, 104 Am. St. Rep. 130, 131. The authorities all agree, however, that if such report is published it must be accurate, fair, and impartial, not garbled, added to, or taken from. No one has a right to take advantage of the privilege, allowed to make comments injurious to the reputation or business of another. Some authorities seem to hold, also, that even if the report be accurately published, the publisher is liable if it be done with an intent to maliciously injure another. If the last-mentioned rule be followed strictly, then it seems to me that the plaintiff should be required to allege more than the bare statement that the publication was made with a malicious intent to injure, but should set out, also, the facts upon which such charge is based. Otherwise no newspaper or private individual would be safe in publishing a report of the proceedings of a court, no matter how fair, accurate, or impartial such report might be, without subjecting himself to an action for libel.

To repeat what was said above from Hubbard v. Furman University, supra: "If the publication is not libelous per se, bad motive or malicious purpose to injure the plaintiff is not enough without an allegation that it affected the evil purpose by conveying to those to whom it was sent a charge injuriously affecting the character or business of the plaintiff."

In R. C. L. vol. 17, p. 829, the law is stated to be: "The question whether or not a communication is privileged is primarily a question of law for the court, where the facts and circumstances surrounding the publication are not disputed by the parties."

For the purpose of the demurrers, the facts and circumstances set out in the complaint are admitted by the defendant. It is therefore for the court in the instant cases to determine whether or not such matters and facts constitute any basis for the action brought by the plaintiffs.

[11, 12] Applying the foregoing principle to the cases before us, the only fact set out to sustain the charge of malice is that the publication in the newspaper was over the protest of the plaintiffs, Louis D. Oliveros and William Terwilliger. I have found no authority which holds that if a person has a right to publish the proceedings of a court that an objection to such publication by some one interested will be sufficient to fix a charge of malicious libel on the publisher. Prima facie, such publication is not libelous, and there is no presumption of malice therefrom.

Again, what is there in the publication "injuriously affecting the character or business of the plaintiff?" Is it not so plain that he who runs may read that defendant, in speaking of plaintiffs on cross-examination as "outlaws," only meant to convey the idea that plaintiffs were selling goods on Sunday in violation of the state laws, and no more?

See Shecut v. McDonald, 3 Brev. 38, 5 Am. Dec. 536. And was this not said while defendant was a witness, and on insistent cross-examination by the same attorney who is now the attorney for the plaintiffs in these cases, and who was then the attorney for the defendants, Louis D. Oliveros and William Terwilliger, in the magistrate's court?

The latter in their second cause of action admit selling ice cream and cigars on Sunday, and can they now be permitted to come into court and claim that their business is being injured because the plaintiff (?) published in the newspaper that they were doing this? Even though the publication be not privileged, can it be fairly and reasonably inferred from the language used that either of these two young men are guilty of any moral obliquity? However, from a somewhat extended examination of the authorities dealing with the subject, I am forced to conclude that the publication is privileged, and that therefore the complaints of Louis D. Oliveros and William Terwilliger in their first cause of action, and the complaint of L. M. C. Oliveros, do not state any cause of action against the defendant, and the demurrers interposed in each of said cases should be sustained; and it is so ordered.

[13] The second cause of action in the Louis D. Oliveros and William Terwilliger cases allege that plaintiffs have been damaged in their business and reputation by a statement in the same publication in the following language:

"To the Citizens of Aiken City and County:

"As is well known, some of the citizens of the city have been earnestly striving for a better observance of Sunday, an effort being made to have the laws of the city conform rather than conflict with the laws of the state.

"To this end a committee from the various churches of Aiken appeared before council, which not only refused this petition, but passed an ordinance which only required closing for two hours on Sunday (10:30 a. m. to 12:30). So that the city was more wide open on this day than in the past.

"Consequently the only course open was an appeal to state law. The law was published in the city and county papers. As a result, all places of business were closed for two succeeding Sundays, and then, in open defiance of the state law, one or two opened up, and continued so to do. After due warning had been given, and disregarded, warrants were issued for one of the firms violating the law, and the case was heard before Magistrate Raborn's court.

"We herewith present the full stenographic report of that trial in order that all the people may know the facts. The defendants admitted the violation of the law, every witness testified to the fact of its violation, and yet in face of all the law and all the evidence the jury brought in a verdict of 'Not guilty.'

"The defendants pleaded that they gave the profits to the Red Cross and exhibited receipts as proof.

"The committee knows full well that the Red Cross, which the people love and to which they gladly contribute with splendid generosity, does not knowingly accept tainted money or money made in their name by violators of the laws, and we believe that all money so received will be returned, if it has not already been returned.

"The defendants made a strong plea of the fact that they kept closed for two hours, 10:30 to 12:30, as provided by city law; but this is wholly foreign to the issue, as the question was state law, and this absolutely forbids business houses opening on Sunday, drug stores excepted, and that only for sale of medicine to relieve sick and suffering humanity.

"In conclusion * * *

"In view of the law and clear, undisputed evidence, and the admissions of the defendants that they had violated it, does it not seem strange that this jury (of which this plaintiff was a member) should bring in a verdict against all the law and all the evidence—a verdict of 'Not guilty?'

"Let the people of our city and county read the record of this trial, form themselves into a jury, and render a verdict in accordance with the law and the evidence. [Signed] C. K. Henderson. Dr. H. H. Wyman, Sr. Rev. O. M. Abney. Rev. P. J. McLean. Rev. John E. Henderson. Rev. John Ridout. G. Cushman. J. T. Shuler. W. E. Shuler. E. C. Cushman. I. N. Eubanks. C. L. Holley. D. M. George. E. L. Shealey. J. E. Seigler. J. Milton Allen. G. E. Owens. E. C. Barrett."

A casual examination of said publication discloses the fact that the words "does not knowingly accept tainted money" is not intended by the signers of the article to charge the plaintiffs, Louis D. Oliveros and William Terwilliger, as being engaged in any "corrupt, reprehensible, or illegal avocation, or contrary to morality," but such words, when taken together with the part of the article set out in the complaint, evidently and plainly meant that the money contributed by said plaintiffs to the Red Cross was earned by said plaintiffs in doing something that was contrary to law.

In the third paragraph of the complaints the plaintiffs allege that each of them engaged in the operation of an ice cream parlor and cigar business.

[14] In the fourth paragraph of said complaint they allege that during the months of January and February, 1920, they did keep open and operate their said place of business on each Sunday in each of said months, and contributed the proceeds of such sales to the American Red Cross Association and the Odd Fellows' Orphanage at Greenville, S. C. The said plaintiffs, therefore, while denying that the said moneys contributed to the Red Cross and orphanage was made or earned contrary to law, in said paragraph 4 admit this to be so. It is clear that, no matter what may have been done with the profits, such sales on Sunday were plain violations of sections 698 and 699 of the Criminal Code of this state.

I presume that the said plaintiffs construed the exceptions in section 698 to permit them to sell on Sunday if the proceeds of such sales were devoted to charitable purposes, but, if so, they were in error.

The section plainly prohibits the exercise of any work or business of a person's ordinary calling on Sunday except works of necessity or charity, and from a legal standpoint the sales of ice cream or cigars are neither a work of necessity nor charity.

I desire to be distinctly understood, however, that I do not intend in any degree to cast any reflections on either of the young men referred to. The laws which they were charged with violating, and which in their complaints they admit, have in many parts of the state been honored more in the breach than in the observance, with the tacit consent and approval of the public.

Now, this has been the case until quite recently in the city of Aiken. It was not wrong in itself, but wrong because the law prohibited it. There are few smokers who would hesitate to purchase cigars or cigarettes on Sunday if they happened to need them and had the opportunity to do so.

From the foregoing facts of the case and the law applicable thereto, I cannot escape the conclusion that the said complaints in their second cause of action state no cases against the defendant.

The demurrers in each of said second causes of action must be sustained; and it is so ordered.

Ex parte LUMMUS COTTON GIN CO.

SAVANNAH GUANO CO. v. SANDERS et al.

(No. 10610.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 13, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \S 704(2)—Finding that creditor had no notice of homestead proceeding not disturbed when record on which exception tried not before the court.

Where a judgment creditor's exception to proceedings to set off the judgment debtor's homestead was tried on the record, and it is not before the Supreme Court, the finding that such judgment creditor had no notice of the proceeding cannot be disturbed.

2. Homestead \S 199—Proceedings to set off not binding on judgment creditor without notice.

A proceeding to set off an execution debtor's homestead is not binding on a judgment creditor who had no notice of the proceeding.

3. Homestead \S 202—When excess over exemption not paid within 60 days, proceedings still open, and judgment creditor entitled to require reassessment.

Under Civ. Code 1912, \S 3713, relative to setting off an execution debtor's homestead when property is worth more than $1,000 and cannot be divided without injury, where the excess over $1,000 was not paid within 60 days as required by that section, but with the permission of the execution creditor was paid from time to time until paid in full, the assignment of the homestead was not complete, and it was not too late for another judgment creditor to object and require a reassessment.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Allendale County; I. W. Bowman, Judge.

Action by the Savannah Guano Company against T. O. Sanders and Annie D. Sanders. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order sustaining the exceptions of the Lummus Cotton Gin Company to proceedings to set off defendants' homestead, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. P. Searson, of Allendale, for appellants.
H. L. O'Bannon, of Barnwell, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The Savannah Guano Company on 4th January, 1916, obtained a judgment against the appellants herein for $1,554.26 and issued execution therefor. The Lummus Cotton Gin Company obtained judgment against the appellants on April 10, 1917, but the record fails to show that they issued execution therefor at the time. In July, 1917, the sheriff took proceedings to set off the appellants' homestead. In November, 1917, the appraisers filed their return with the sheriff, in which they assessed the real property of appellants at $2,750. The sheriff then served the required notice on appellants to pay the surplus of $1,750 into his office within 60 days. Further time was given the defendants in execution by the judgment creditor, and they paid it along from time to time until the senior judgment was paid in full on November 13, 1919. On November 17, 1919, the Lummus Cotton Gin Company filed the homestead proceedings in the office of the clerk of the court, and on November 19, 1919, filed exceptions on the ground that it had received no notice of the homestead proceedings and asked a trial de novo. Other exceptions and some affidavits were filed, but were subsequently withdrawn; so this case stands upon the one exception.

[1] The case was tried on the record and his honor, Judge Bowman, who had the record before him, found as a matter of fact that no notice had been given the Lummus Cotton Gin Company, and, as the record is not before us, we cannot disturb this finding.

[2] There being no notice given to the judgment creditor, Lummus Cotton Gin Company, they are not bound by the proceedings. See Nixon Grocery Co. v. Spann, 108 S. C. 329, 94 S. E. 531.

[3] Besides this, the appraisers valued the land as exceeding the homestead by $1,750. Of this due notice was given to the judgment debtor. Section 3713 provides that the excess must be paid within 60 days, and only when the excess is paid "within the time limited" shall the sheriff refrain from selling; "that if, after notice, the party claiming the homestead pays, or causes to be paid, the surplus over one thousand ($1,000.00) dollars, he shall, upon recording the return and receipt of the sheriff for such surplus, indorsed on said return, as provided in preceding section of this chapter, hold the property so appraised and set off, freed and discharged from all debts," etc. It is thus seen that the assignment of homestead was not complete. The matter was still open, and the respondent was in time to object and require a reassessment.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. I do not concur in the affirmation of the order appealed from in this case, and think that it should be reversed.

At the risk of unnecessary repetition, in order that my position may be clearly understood, I will restate the basic facts of this controversy. The Savannah Guano Company obtained a judgment against the defendants Sanders on January 4, 1916, issued execution, and lodged it with the sheriff. The Lummus Cotton Gin Company did likewise, their judgment being dated April 10, 1917, but no execution was issued thereupon. In July, 1917, the sheriff, acting under section 3711, vol. 1, Code of Laws 1912, instituted proceedings to cause a homestead in certain real estate belonging to the defendants to be set off. I assume he caused the appraisers therefor to be appointed as directed by the statute. In November, 1917, the appraisers made and filed with the sheriff their return, valuing the property at $2,750. Thereupon the sheriff served upon the defendants the notice provided for in section 3713 that, unless they paid to him the surplus of the appraised value over and above $1,000, to wit, $1,750, within 60 days thereafter, the premises would be sold under the execution in his hands. By agreement between the defendants and the Savannah Guano Company, plaintiff in the execution, indulgence was granted to the defendants, who from time to time made payments upon the execution until November 13, 1919, at which time the execution was paid in full, returned to the clerk as paid, and the judgment marked satisfied. The return of the appraisers, though lodged with the sheriff, had not at this last-named date been filed by him with the clerk of court for record as required by the statute; but on November 7, 1919, the Lummus Cotton Gin Company, a week prior thereto, procured the return from the sheriff's office and filed it with the clerk of court, and on November 19, 1919, filed with the clerk exceptions to the return. The notice in which the exceptions are stated requires special attention. It states that the gin company was a judgment creditor of the defendants on July 28, 1917, when the warrant was issued to the appraisers in homestead, and particularizes the grounds of exception to be: (1) That no notice was given the gin company of the homestead proceedings and no opportunity was offered it to be heard therein; (2) that the appraisement was far below the value of the property, which was at least $6,000. The notice then concludes with a prayer, not that the homestead proceedings be "vacated and set aside" (as the circuit judge ordered), but "that the question of the value of said land be tried de novo, upon testimony taken in open court, under the provisions of section 3711 of the Civil Code of this state."

The matter came up for trial before Judge Bowman at Allendale February 6, 1920, in open court. The gin company abandoned the second exception above stated, and withdrew certain affidavits which had been served upon the defendants, I assume affidavits supporting this second exception. Counsel agreed to submit the matter to the presiding judge upon the first exception and the record of the homestead proceedings, which showed no notice to the gin company nor any opportunity afforded it to be heard in said homestead proceedings.

The circuit judge passed an order vacating and setting aside the homestead proceedings and directed the sheriff to proceed to set off the homestead according to law.

I think that the notice and the exceptions clearly show that the gin company had no thought of contesting the validity of the homestead proceedings. It did propose, in the outset, to contest the return so far as the appraised value of the property was concerned, and evidently incorporated the matter stated in the first exception, relating to want of notice, for the purpose of establishing its rights at that time to raise the real issue tendered, the inadequate valuation of the property, which it set up in the second exception. The prayer of the notice is conclusive of this fact. In this position the gin company was quite right, for, the return not having been filed with the clerk "for record," as required by the statute, the time within which a creditor should file exceptions thereto had not begun to run, and it was within the law when it filed exceptions within 30 days from the time the return was filed. The gin company also recognized the validity of the return by taking it out of the sheriff's office and filing it with the clerk, which it evidently did for the purpose of filing exceptions thereto. At the hearing the gin company abandoned the second exception and withdrew the supporting affidavits. This left nothing but the first exception, which contained only a justification at that time in filing exceptions to the return.

The gin company cannot come into court recognizing the validity of the proceedings, raise an issue which would be in order only under a valid proceeding, abandon that issue, and contend that the entire proceeding is invalid and should be vacated. Some consideration is due to the rights of the other party to the controversy. The orderly conduct of a trial forbids that one should be haled into court to meet one issue and be confronted with another, essentially different.

But assume for the moment that the gin company had the right to raise the issue that because it had not been served with notice of the homestead proceedings prior to the making and lodgment of the appraisers' return with the sheriff, the entire proceedings were null and void; I do not think that its position can be sustained.

The Code (sections 3711-3720) provides for the setting off of homestead under two conditions: (1) Where process has been lodged with the sheriff; and (2) where no process has been so lodged.

Where process has been lodged, the initiative is on the part of the sheriff. He is required, before selling the debtor's real estate, to cause the homestead to be set off in a certain, specified, and detailed manner. He shall cause three appraisers to be appointed. They shall within 30 days make return to him of their action, the return to be filed "for record in the office of the clerk of court." Should there be no complaint by either creditor or debtor within 30 days after the return shall have been filed, the proceedings shall be final. Should exceptions be so filed, "the name shall be tried de novo, upon testimony taken in open court"; the court being authorized for good cause shown to order a reappraisal and reassignment of the homestead by other appraisers appointed by the court.

Where process has not been lodged, the initiative is on the part of the homesteader. He is required to file a petition to the master (or clerk of court, if there be no master), who shall, after giving the public notice required, appoint three appraisers. They shall make return to such officer. The provisions relating to exceptions and the effect of not excepting are practically the same as in cases where process has been lodged.

There is nothing in the record showing that the gin company took the position before the circuit judge that the homestead proceedings were absolutely void for lack of notice to it prior to the return, but, as the circuit judge so holds in his order, and the respondent's attorney endeavors in his printed argument to sustain that position, I propose to consider it.

As this court holds in the case of In re Wylie, 63 S. C. 214, at page 217, 41 S. E. 320, the sections providing for a homestead under the conditions to which I have referred (where process has been lodged and where it has not) are statutes in pari materia and may be paralleled in the interpretation of either upon a contested point. For this reason I have briefly abstracted the provisions of both, as above, in the consideration of the matter now under discussion, the necessity of notice to creditors generally of the homestead proceedings prior to the return of the appraisers.

In homestead proceedings where process has been lodged, which for brevity I shall refer to as involuntary proceedings, there is no express requirement that any creditor shall be so notified, though there is an implied requirement that the creditor in the process which has been lodged with the sheriff shall be, in the provision that one of the appraisers shall be named by such creditor, which of course could not be done until he shall have been notified of the sheriff's proposed action.

In the other class, where process has not been lodged, which I shall refer to as voluntary proceedings, there is no requirement, express or implied, that any creditor shall be personally served with such notice; the provision for "public notice by advertisement" evidently being a sufficient substituted notice to all creditors.

I am aware of the fact that this court, in the case of Nixon v. Spann, 108 S. C. 329, 333, 94 S. E. 531, has given expression to views upon this point not in accord with my construction of the statute. I think that that decision imposes conditions which the statute does not warrant and which are unreasonable and entirely unnecessary. In that case the return of appraisers was filed on February 11, 1915. No exceptions were filed by any creditor within the 30 days fixed by the statute. The return was recorded on March 15, 1915. No exceptions to the return were ever filed. That the complaining creditor had notice of the homestead proceedings, or at least of the return, is shown by the fact that on February 12, 1915, the day after the return was filed, he brought an action in the court of common pleas, among other things, to set aside the assignment of homestead on the grounds that the allowance was excessive and that it had been set off in fraud of creditors. By an amended complaint the additional ground was made that the creditor was not a party to the homestead proceeding, had no notice of it, and was not therefore bound by it. Upon the question of the validity of the homestead proceedings the court held that, as the appraisers had attempted to set off the real estate of the debtor subject to mortgages existing upon it, their action was absolutely null and void; and, being so, the return could be attacked in a collateral proceeding. Having so decided, it was not at all necessary to go into the question of the right of the creditor to attack the proceedings, assuming that they were not void. In reference to this matter the court declared:

"Even if the assignment of homestead had not been void, those creditors who had not been given legal notice of the proceedings to assign homestead could have excepted to the return of the appraisers, even after the expiration of 30 days from the filing of their return and within 30 days after notice thereof given to them. Notice and opportunity to be heard is essential to due process of law, and therefore essential to the binding efficacy of such a proceeding. The statute contemplates that notice of such a proceeding shall be given to all creditors. It is the duty of the sheriff or other officer with whom process has been lodged to notify all creditors who are parties to such process; and if the debtor would make the proceeding final and binding upon all his creditors, he should see to it that legal notice is given to all others. This requirement can work no hardship upon a debtor who seeks to have a part of his property exempted from the payment of his existing debts, for he knows, or ought to know, who his creditors are. Otherwise the grossest fraud might be perpetrated upon creditors who have no notice of the proceeding to set off homestead."

If this be affirmed as the law of this state, I venture to say that there is not an involuntary homestead proceeding in the state which possesses the quality of finality which the statute expressly provides for. It declares:

"If no complaint shall be made by either creditor or debtor within 30 days after the return of the appraisers has been filed, the proceedings in the case shall be final." Civ. Code 1912, § 8711.

I imagine it will be a distinct shock to the legal advisers of this state, and to the debtors to whom homesteads have been assigned, that not one of the thousands of homesteads which have been assigned can withstand the attack of a single creditor, however small his claim may be, who can show that he did not receive "legal notice" of the proceedings prior to the return, and thereby rip up the entire proceedings and subject the debtor, confiding in the finality guaranteed by the statute, to the annoyance, trouble, and expense of a new proceeding.

No question was made in the case cited as to the right of the creditor to file exceptions to the return; he made no effort whatever to do so; and the foregoing observations of the court to the effect that notice was requisite and that a creditor who had not received notice could even after the expiration of 30 days, and within 30 days after notice, file exceptions, appear to me to be obiter dicta. They certainly do not go to the extent of holding that a creditor who has not received notice can upon that ground avoid the entire proceeding. As far as it goes, I think, is that when such is the case he has 30 days after notice within which to file exceptions. That is going farther than the statute warrants.

The cases cited by the court, in my opinion, do not sustain either the proposition that notice is requisite or that failure to give the notice avoids the proceeding:

Ryan v. Pettigrew, 7 S. C. 147: The defendant claimed possession of the real estate involved upon the ground that it had been set off to him as his homestead. Plaintiff claimed under execution sale. It appeared that the return had never been filed with the clerk. The court, of course, held that the homestead had not been perfected. The case involves neither point under discussion.

Choice v. Charles, 7 S. C. 171: This case involves exactly the same question as was decided in the case just referred to.

Bull v. Rowe, 13 S. C. 355: This was also a case where the return was not filed and recorded in the clerk's office. The court says:

"It is not necessary that any one should know of the assignment but the levying creditor, the sheriff and the appraisers."

In re Wylie, 63 S. C. 214, 41 S. E. 320: This case, so far from sustaining the positions under discussion, points out the remedy which a creditor has of excepting to the return after it has been filed. It was contended in that case, and it is the only question decided, that the right of excepting to a return was limited to judgment creditors. This position was overruled by the court, which held that the appellant, a simple contract creditor, had the right to except within the time limited.

I think that the statute means just what it says; that when in involuntary proceedings the return has been duly filed for record with the clerk, and no one complains within 30 days thereafter by filing exceptions to the return, "the proceedings in the case shall be final"; in other words, that the filing and recording of the return as directed is notice to the world of the assignment of the homestead, just as the published notice in voluntary proceedings has that effect.

If, as stated in the Nixon Case, "the statute contemplates that notice of such a proceeding shall be given to all creditors," it would naturally be expected that the statute would also suggest some course of proceeding upon the part of the creditors to protect their interests after being so notified; yet in it I find absolutely nothing for them to do, and can imagine no step in that proceeding that they could take to stop its progress or to influence the action of the sheriff or the appraisers. It would also seem to follow that, if they received the required notice and did nothing, they would be shut off from further objection; and yet unquestionably the statute permits them to file exceptions within 30 days, regardless of whether they have failed to follow up a prior notice or not.

A further consideration which militates very strongly against the declaration in the Nixon Case is suggested: In a case of involuntary proceedings, the sheriff is the moving spirit. He is required to set off the homestead before selling. Section 3721 makes it a misdemeanor and prescribes a heavy penalty for his violation of this duty. While it cannot be denominated exactly a proceeding in invitum against the debtor, it certainly is a proceeding in which he is utterly passive. Absolutely nothing is expected of him except to name one of the appraisers, and this privilege may be waived by him. In this state of the statutory provisions, how the duty not prescribed in the statute of notifying all of his creditors of the proposed action of the sheriff can be imposed upon him by judicial declaration is inconceivable to me.

Another consideration: Assume an instance of a return by the appraisers fixing the valuation of the property at $2,750. The sheriff gives the required notice, and the debtor, within the 60 days and after the expiration of the 30 days for filing exceptions, there having been none filed, pays to the sheriff the excess over $1,000, $1,750. The sheriff applies this to the executions in his office. Section 3713 provides that under these conditions the debtor shall "hold the property so appraised and set off, freed and discharged from all debts and demands then existing"; and yet, under the Nixon Case, if it should appear that he has not complied with a condition not required by the statute, namely, notified all his creditors of the proceedings instituted by the sheriff, the proceedings may be set aside, a new appraisal had, a second valuation at $2,750, and a second payment of the excess required.

But it is suggested in the Nixon Case that the creditors were entitled to notice of the institution of the proceedings, upon the ground:

"Notice and opportunity to be heard is essential to due process of law, and therefore essential to the binding efficacy of such a proceeding."

The object in requiring the return to be filed with the clerk for record was to provide a form of notice to the world, of which the creditors are assumed to be cognizant. The provision allowing exceptions to be filed by them within 30 days thereafter is ample protection to their constitutional rights.

"Due process of law is afforded litigants if they have an opportunity to be heard at any time before final judgment is entered," but a hearing or an opportunity to be heard, prior to judgment, is absolutely essential. Wilson v. Standefer, 184 U. S. 399, 22 Sup. Ct. 384, 46 L. Ed. 612.

Moreover, in the absence of legislative action conferring upon a creditor the remedy of enforcing the collection of his debt out of the property of his debtor, the creditor has no such right or remedy. The remedy is entirely the creature of the statute. It cannot be claimed as a constitutional right. It is entirely dependent upon the statute; and, if so, the legislative authority has the right to hedge it about with such limitations as it may deem expedient. It may deny it altogether or exempt any portion of the debtor's property that it sees fit, the exemption to be determined in any way it sees fit, with or without notice to the creditor. His supposed right or remedy is therefore not "property" within the "due process" clause of the Constitution, unless the debt antedated the legislative limitation or exemption or machinery for its ascertainment.

It is suggested in the opinion of Mr. Justice FRASER that the failure of the defendants to pay to the sheriff the excess of the appraisal over $1,000 renders the assignment incomplete, and that the gin company was in time to object and require a reassessment. The penalty under section 3713 for not complying with the notice of the sheriff is a sale of the property, not a reassignment of the homestead. But, as no such position was taken in the court below or in the arguments in this court, I express no opinion as to the effect of such failure upon the proceedings in this case.

MITCHELL v. CORNELL et al. (No. 4122.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 8, 1921. Rehearing Denied
May 10, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances §249—"Laches," whereby through death of witnesses adverse party injured, bars relief in equity.

Laches is delay in the assertion of a claim which works disadvantage to another, and where it appears that by reason of such delay the adverse party would be injuriously affected because of the death of witnesses by whom the truth of the situation could be proven, or for other reasons, a court of equity will decline to give relief.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Laches.]

2. Fraudulent conveyances §249—Equitable doctrine of laches applicable to suit to subject lands held in name of another.

The equitable doctrine of laches applies to a suit brought by a creditor for the purpose of subjecting to sale lands which it is claimed by him are the lands of his debtor, but the title to which is held by another in fraud of his rights.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wood County.

Suit by Lillian Mitchell, as administratrix, against John Cornell and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants S. L. Anderson, administrator, and others, appeal. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

H. B. Dodge and Marshall & Forrer, all of Parkersburg, for appellants.

William Beard, of Parkersburg, for appellee.

RITZ, P. This appeal seeks reversal of a decree of the circuit court of Wood county, which decreed to sale, in satisfaction of a judgment in favor of plaintiff's intestate against John Cornell, a tract of 16¼ acres of land lying near the city of Parkersburg claimed by the heirs of J. A. Anderson, upon the ground that said tract of land was really the property of said John Cornell, and was concealed in the name of J. A. Anderson in fraud of plaintiff's rights.

It appears that prior to the year 1892 John Cornell was extensively engaged in the business of purchasing and manufacturing ties and other lumber, and incidentally in the general mercantile business. In that year he failed in business, and according to the allegations of the bill he has never accumulated any property since, and has never actively engaged in any business. The debt claimed by the plaintiff was contracted prior to 1892. In the year 1892 plaintiff's decedent instituted a suit in the circuit court of Wirt county to recover the amount of the debt from said Cornell. Cornell appeared to this suit and filed his plea of non assumpsit, and the same was continued from term to term until the year 1897, when, in the absence of Cornell, and without the intervention of a jury to try the issue joined, a judgment was rendered against him for the sum of $4,200, with interest from 1892, and this judgment is the basis of the plaintiff's claim for relief.

Cornell and J. A. Anderson were brothers-in-law, Anderson having married a sister of Cornell. It appears, however, that Anderson's first wife, the sister of Cornell, died long before the institution of this suit, and he had married a second time. It is not contended that any funds belonging to Cornell went into the purchase of any land in the name of Anderson after 1892 at the time of his business failure, for it clearly appears that since that time he has had no funds or property. The basis of this suit is that about the time of his failure in 1892, or shortly prior thereto, he had conveyed away two tracts of land, and had taken from the purchasers bonds to secure the unpaid purchase money. It appears that a very small part of the purchase money was paid in cash. These bonds he assigned to Anderson, and the purchasers, failing to meet their obligations and desiring to be relieved therefrom, reconveyed the land to Anderson in consideration that they be relieved from the payment of the purchase money bonds. These deeds were taken, and the facts as above stated are recited in the deeds, and the same were recorded in the proper county clerk's office. However, before Anderson secured these deeds a creditors' suit had been brought against Cornell, and these lands involved in that suit. It appears that Anderson proved in this creditors' suit a claim for a considerable amount, and became the purchaser of the same lands at a sale by the special commissioner, as well as of another tract or two. There is some suggestion that this claim set up by Anderson in that suit was fraudulent as against Cornell's creditors. It was, however, adjudged by that court to be a valid claim against the estate of Cornell, and it can hardly be said that its validity can be questioned in this collateral way. The suggestion is made that the transfer of the purchase money bonds above referred to was made by Cornell to Anderson without consideration, and that he intended to get this property out of his hands so as to prevent his creditors from seizing it, and this is the only substantial basis for this suit.

At the time of the purchase of these lands by Anderson as above stated there was interested with him in one piece thereof a man by the name of W. B. Dillon. It was the understanding, according to Dillon, that he was to have a one-half interest in this piece of land. The title to all of the land was held by Anderson but it appears that Dillon lived on a piece of it, and that Cornell lived with him. In 1899 this land was sold, and a tract of 288 acres was purchased in Calhoun county. Dillon claims that he still had his half interest in this 288 acres. At any rate, he and Cornell went upon this land and immediately constructed thereon a house, into which he moved his family. Cornell resided with him in the same house, he at that time having no family. Dillon and Cornell conducted timber operations upon the land. The proceeds arising from the sales of timber were deposited in the bank to the credit of Anderson, and the same paid out by Cornell upon checks signed in Anderson's name, for the expense of removing the timber and manufacturing it, and for some balance of purchase money upon the land. Dillon states that, after the timber operations had been completed, he, being unable to carry his half interest, proposed to Cornell that he would release his interest in the land in consideration of the transfer to him of certain logging equipment which they had, and which had been used in their timber operations. He says that Cornell advised him that he would see Anderson and submit his proposition; that shortly thereafter he did go to Wood county where Anderson lived, and upon his return informed him that the proposition was accepted; and that he thereupon relinquished his interest in the land and accepted the personal property therefor. This proposition of Dillon carried with it his right to remain in the house upon the land so long as Anderson owned it, and he did remain with his family in this house, and Cornell lived there with him until 1909, at which time the land was conveyed away by Anderson as a part payment upon the tract of 16¼ acres involved in this suit.

It appears that in 1909 the 16¼ acres of land in Wood county was conveyed to Anderson in consideration of $8,750, of which consideration the Calhoun county 288 acres was taken for $5,000. Anderson assumed a mortgage which was on the land for $3,000, and the other $750 was paid in cash. The party who conducted this transaction for the former owners states that Cornell approached him in regard to the sale of the 288 acres of Calhoun county land, stating that Anderson desired to dispose of it on account of its remoteness from his residence and his inability for that reason to give it proper attention. He says that he informed Cornell that he had the 16¼-acre tract, and that if satisfactory arrangements could be made as to the price he might take the 288 acres as part of the purchase money. He informed Cornell the price at which the property could be had, and he says that Cornell told him that he would see Anderson in regard to it and let him know what determination was reached. He says that subsequently Anderson and Cornell went upon the land and examined it, and then Cornell came to his office and closed the transaction by paying $50 in cash at that time, and subsequently by Anderson conveying the 288 acres to the former owners of the 16¼ acres, and paying $700 in cash, and assuming the $3,000 mortgage. It is shown that Cornell rented this 16¼ acres ever since its purchase as aforesaid, and that he lived in a room in the house upon the premises.

The bill charges that this 16¼ acres is in fact the property of Cornell upon the theory that at the time of Cornell's failure he transferred certain of his property as above indicated to Anderson, and that as a result of this Anderson procured the 288 acres in Calhoun county, which subsequently went into the 16¼ acres, and that the $750 in cash was derived from funds of Cornell, although there is no showing whatever as to this, except that the $50 was paid by Cornell. Cornell and Anderson were both living at the time the suit was instituted, and they each filed an answer denying all of the allegations of fraud, and asserting that the property was the property of Anderson, and Anderson also relied upon the equitable doctrine of laches to defeat the plaintiff's claim. A few months after the suit was brought, and before the plaintiff had taken any depositions, Cornell, who was then an old man, departed this life. In a very short time after the institution of the suit, and before any testimony was taken, Anderson's mind became so affected that he was never able to give his testimony in the case, and died before the same was submitted for a hearing. Plaintiff's decedent departed this life in the year 1914, two years before the suit was brought, 22 years after it is claimed the fraudulent transaction was had between Anderson and Cornell, on account of which the land is sought to be subjected in this suit.

The testimony taken on behalf of the plaintiff is almost exclusively made up of statements made by Cornell to a number of people that the 288 acres of Calhoun county land was his land, and that the 16¼ acres was likewise his land, and of the further fact that Cornell had always lived upon the 288 acres of Calhoun county land with Dillon, and upon the 16¼ acres, ever since it was acquired, with the tenant thereof, and upon the further fact that the transfers of the purchase money notes above referred to by Cornell to Anderson were made about the time Cornell became embarrassed, and it is claimed they were without consideration, although no proof is offered upon this question.

As before stated, Cornell died before the testimony was taken, and counsel could not even intelligently cross-examine the witnesses whose evidence had been given as to the statements made by him. If he had been present it may be that the time, place, and circumstances under which these statements were made could have been developed, and their force as evidence entirely destroyed. The plaintiff, in order to prevail, must rely upon alleged fraudulent conduct which was committed nearly a quarter of a century before the institution of the suit. It clearly appears that Cornell had never had any property since 1892, and if any transfer of property to Anderson to defraud his creditors was made, it was made prior to that time. The equitable doctrine of laches by which one is denied the right to assert a claim in a court of equity, because of staleness or lapse of time, is well recognized by this court. It is quite true that mere lapse of time will not effect such a bar, but must be accompanied by some injury or disadvantage to the opposite party, or some conduct which indicates that the plaintiff had abandoned his claim, and only reasserts it because of some advantage arising under conditions brought about either by the action of the other party, by territorial development, or some other like cause. 10 R. C. L. title "Equity," § 142 et seq.; Carter v. Price, 85 W. Va. 744, 102 S. E. 685; Edgell v. Smith, 50 W. Va. 349, 40 S. E. 402. Many more cases could be cited to the same effect, but these suffice to illustrate the principle.

In this case it appears that Cornell died before he had an opportunity of making any explanation of the testimony offered on behalf of the plaintiff; that Anderson's mind had become so weakened and diseased that he was denied the opportunity of making any such explanation. The transaction happened 24 years before the institution of this suit, and 27 years before the final decree was entered. It may be that if this suit had been brought within a reasonable time a full and satisfactory explanation could have been made of all these transactions. The parties might have been able to show that Anderson paid an adequate consideration for the transfer of the purchase-money notes to him by Cornell above referred to, every dollar of which was paid by Cornell to his creditors. The special commissioner who conducted the sale of the lands of which Anderson became the purchaser is dead. The former owner of the 288 acres of Calhoun county land is dead. It appears that the plaintiff's intestate who died in 1914, 22 years after the alleged fraudulent transaction, lived in the same general neighborhood as the defendants Cornell and Anderson; that he was well acquainted with them, and that he was vigilant in trying to detect some property of Cornell's out of which his debt could be made. The records in the county clerk's office would have informed him of these deeds made to Anderson, and they would have informed him of the transfer of the purchase-money notes by Cornell to Anderson, which is all the information that the plaintiff now has upon that question. There is no reason why, if he had been vigilant, he could not have known in 1892 everything in regard to the transaction between Anderson and Cornell that is shown in this case. When a court of equity sees neglect or lack of diligence on one side, and injury therefrom on the other, it will deny relief.

[1, 2] But the plaintiff contends that the equitable doctrine of laches does not apply to a suit in equity to enforce a judgment lien, that nothing but the bar of the statute of limitations will be availing, and that inasmuch as this judgment has been kept alive by the issuance of executions she is entitled to maintain the same. This would be entirely true if she were enforcing a judgment against the lands of Cornell, but the principal object of the suit is to determine that these lands are subject to the judgment. Upon the face of the record the judgment is not a lien upon these lands, and they can only be made subject to the judgment by resorting to equity, and having them declared in effect trust property in the hands of Anderson for the benefit of Cornell's creditors. There is no more reason for denying the application of the equitable doctrine of laches to a suit brought for this purpose than there is to any other suit in equity, where it is sought to affect the transactions of parties because of fraudulent conduct. The first question presented in the case is: Who is the owner in fact of the land? If it is Cornell, then the judgment is a lien thereon, and it can be enforced. If Anderson is the owner of the lands, then the judgment is not a lien thereon, and the same cannot be enforced, and when the aid of a court of equity is sought for the purpose of determining this question the equitable doctrine of laches is as applicable as it is to any other relief that may be sought. While there seems to be no case in this state in which the doctrine has been applied in a suit by a creditor to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, the reason for its application is the same in such a suit as in any other, and it has been applied in such cases in other jurisdictions without question. 14 Am. & Eng. Eq. 219, 21 Atl. 193; Frenche v. Kitchen, 53 N. J. Eq. 37, 30 Atl. 815; Egleberger v. Kibler, 1 Hill, Eq. (S. C.) 113, 26 Am. Dec. 192; Calhoun v. Burton, 64 Tex. 510; Kinmouth v. Walling (N. J.) 36 Atl. 891; Hildebrand v. Tarbell, 97 Wis. 446, 73 N. W. 53.

Having come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's right of action is barred by the equitable doctrine of laches, it becomes unnecessary to examine the other questions presented on this appeal.

We will reverse the decree of the circuit court of Wood county and dismiss the bill.

(83 W. Va. 209)

CAMPBELL et al. v. LYNCH et al. (three cases). (Nos. 4091, 4108, 4156.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. March 15, 1921. Rehearing Denied May 10, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1097(2) — Questions adjudicated on former appeal law of case whether correct or not.

Unless for other reasons a decree must be reversed, questions adjudicated on a former appeal must be adhered to on a second appeal as the law of the case, whether or not those questions were rightly decided.

2. Appeal and error \S 1099(6) — Answer pleading sufficiency of bill disposed of on former appeal is mere renewal of matter adjudicated.

In so far as an answer pleads the sufficiency of the matter of a bill disposed of here on demurrer thereto upon a former appeal, the answer will be regarded as a renewal of the demurrer, and as fully adjudicated on the former appeal.

3. Equity \S 373 — Where respondent desires to take evidence to support answer, he should move for continuance.

If upon the filing of his answer to a bill matured for hearing, and replication of the plaintiff thereto, respondent desires time to take evidence in support of his answer, good practice requires that he should move the court for a continuance, without which he will be regarded as having waived his right and as consenting to a hearing on bill and answer.

4. Partition \S 22 — Agreement giving interest to one not legally entitled thereto must be clearly proven.

To be binding and effective an alleged agreement that a partition of land should include interests not legally involved therein, the agreement should be clearly proven, and it should appear that all the partitioners were parties thereto and mutually bound thereby.

5. Estoppel \S 60, 118 — Estoppel must be certain, and must not be taken by argument or inference.

Every estoppel, since it concludes one from alleging the truth, must be certain to every intent and is not to be taken by argument or inference; and the facts upon which it is based must be clearly proven and not capable of bearing any other construction.

6. Estoppel \S 95 — Mere silence insufficient; person to be estopped must have full knowledge, and must intend to mislead.

Mere silence will not work an estoppel; to be effective it must appear that the person to be estopped has full knowledge of all the facts and of his rights, and intended to mislead or at least was willing that the other party might be misled by his attitude.

7. Husband and wife \S 221 — Wife not necessary party to suit for accounting under reservation of oil rights by husband.

When a contract and a deed from husband and wife which sold and granted all the right and title of the grantors in land in which the husband is interested, reserved and excepted therefrom one-sixteenth part of the oil therein belonging to the husband, the wife is not a necessary party to a suit subsequently brought during his life for an accounting and division of the oil produced from the land.

8. Equity \S 323 — To prevent injustice, court may permit substitution of new answer during trial.

Where during the progress of a suit it appears that a position taken in an answer will work a great injustice and result inequitably to respondent in the division and partition of the oil and gas produced from the land, the court in the exercise of a sound discretion should permit respondent to withdraw his original answer and file a new one, in order to relieve him from the inequitable and unjust consequences.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Roane County.

Three separate suits by W. C. Campbell and others against Lucy J. Lynch and others and W. O. Abney and others. From the decrees W. C. Campbell and others appeal in the first suit, Lucy J. Lynch and others appeal in the second suit, and W. O. Abney and others appeal in the third suit. Reversed and remanded.

Chas. E. Hogg, of Point Pleasant, and J. W. Kennedy and J. F. Cork, both of Charleston, for appellants W. C. Campbell and others.

McClintic, Mathews & Campbell, of Charleston, for appellants W. O. Abney and others. Harper & Baker, of Spencer, and Turner & Brennan, of Parkersburg, for appellees Lucy J. Lynch and others.

H. C. Ferguson, of Spencer, for appellee John Edward Lewis.

MILLER, J. The appeal by Campbell and others, plaintiffs, in Case No. 4091, is from the decree below of January 23, 1920, which for the second time dismissed their bill and denied them any relief. When this case was formerly before us on plaintiffs' appeal, in November, 1917 (81 W. Va. 374, 94 S. E. 739, L. R. A. 1918B, 1070), we reversed the decree of the circuit court sustaining defendants' demurrer to their bill, and remanded the cause to the circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein in accordance with the opinion and mandate thereto certified.

The appeal in Case No. 4108, by the defendants Lucy J. Lynch, James McC. Lewis, Fannie M. Simpson, Mary Lewis Good, and Enos Johnson, administrators of the estate of Mary M. Lewis, is from the decree of May 27, 1919, entered in the said cause, which settled the rights of the parties in accordance with the rules and principles of our former decree, and referred the cause to a commissioner to state and settle the accounts between the parties to the suit in accordance therewith.

The appeal in Case No. 4156 by W. O. Abney and others, heirs and personal representatives of the estate of F. W. Abney, deceased, from the decree of January 23, 1920, which dismissed plaintiffs' bill, refused to confirm the report of the commissioner, and denied them the right to withdraw their original answer and file their new answer then tendered and offered to be filed.

In addition to these several appeals there are cross-errors assigned on behalf of John Edward Lewis, by H. C. Ferguson, his counsel, which will be hereafter adverted to and disposed of.

[1, 2] Unless avoided or affected by issues presented by the answers, the former decision here, though by a divided court, must be regarded as the law of this case. Formerly the case was presented upon the bill and the exhibits therewith, and the demurrer of the defendants thereto sustained by the lower court, but which we overruled, and remanded the cause. Our opinion on the former hearing will disclose that the questions then presented were, what is the true construction of the two leases for oil and gas executed by Edward Lewis and Mary M. Lewis, his wife, in April, 1900, and what the effect on the rights of the parties to the oil and gas of the subsequent decree dividing and partitioning the lands covered by said leases between the heirs at law of the said Edward Lewis, then deceased, referred to in the bill, and the subsequent conduct of the partitioners in relation thereto, and in relation to the subsequent development of oil and gas on the lands allotted the partitioners?

Unless a good defense was presented by the answers of the defendants filed on the remand to the circuit court, the decree pronounced on May 27, 1919, should be adhered to and executed, and that of January 23, 1920, again dismissing the bill, should be reversed upon the appeal and assignments of error therein by the appellants Campbell and others in Case No. 4091, and of W. O. Abney and others in Case No. 4156.

That the court below was bound, as we are now bound on this appeal, by whatever was decided upon the former appeal as the law of this case, is not an open question in this state, unless for want of parties or for other error in the decree it must be reversed. Seabright v. Seabright, 33 W. Va. 152, 10 S. E. 265; Mason v. Harper's Ferry Bridge Co., 20 W. Va. 223; Wick v. Dawson, 48 W. Va. 469, 37 S. E. 639; Pennington v. Gillaspie, 66 W. Va. 643, 66 S. E. 1009. And this is the law in most jurisdictions, state and federal. Campbell's Ex'rs v. Campbell's Ex'rs, 22 Grat. (Va.) 649; Bank of Old Dominion v. McVeigh, 29 Grat. (Va.) 546. For a full note on the subject with reference to many decisions, see City of Hastings v. Foxworthy, 45 Neb. 676, 63 N. W. 955, 34 L. R. A. 321.

The issues sought to be presented by the answers of Lucy J. Lynch and others, defendants, were: First, that in the suit for partition and assignment of dower brought by Lucy J. Lynch v. Mary M. Lewis et al., widow and heirs of Edward Lewis, deceased, referred to and pleaded in the bill, the court, having jurisdiction of the subject matter and the parties, had by the decree of partition therein pronounced on April 2, 1907, finally adjudicated beyond recall the rights of the parties in interest in the land partitioned and in the oil and gas therein; and said decree was pleaded in estoppel of the claims of the plaintiffs to any of the oil and gas produced by the lessee in said leases not found under and produced from the particular lot allotted to them in said partition; second, that the plaintiffs W. O. Campbell and his children, then adults, had agreed with the widow and other heirs of said Edward Lewis, at the time of said partition, that the person to whom each purpart was assigned should be and was entitled in fee to the oil and gas underlying the same, and that W. C. Campbell and his children had acquiesced in such decree and agreement, for nearly seven years, until the situation of the parties had changed, and until they had concluded that the two parcels of land allotted to them would not prove as valuable for oil and gas as anticipated at the time of said partition; third, that early in 1907, John E. Lewis, F. W. Abney and W. C. Campbell, by written notice to the South Penn Oil Company, Mary M. Lewis and others, protested that they owned the oil and gas under the lands allotted to them, and that John E. Lewis and said Abney had, under the claim that they owned the oil and gas under the tract assigned to them, brought suit against the South Penn Oil Company and others to cancel the lease thereon as a cloud on their title, thereby estopping themselves from asserting any interest in the oil and gas under the purparts assigned to others; fourth, that after the completion of the gas well assigned to John E. Lewis and F. W. Abney, the gas rental of $200.00 per year was paid to and received by said Abney, and that the plaintiff W. O. Campbell, after said partition and for more than three years after the drilling of the well on the purparts assigned to the other partitioners, had accepted the rentals accrued to him under the said leases; fifth, that upon the drilling of the wells on each purpart on which oil and gas were found the lessee had recognized the partition of said land including the oil and gas and treated such allottee as the owner in fee of the oil and gas in and under the parcels allotted to them, and thereby had agreed to the subdivision of the original leases into seven, and of all which said Campbell and his children had notice, and had acquiesced therein for at least six years, and until they supposed that said partition had turned out to their disadvantage.

After the filing of the foregoing answers, the administrator of Mary M. Lewis and others filed supplemental answers, in which they set up that in the event the decrees in the partition suit were not held binding and efficacious to partition the oil and gas, that the said Mary M. Lewis and her personal representatives under the terms of the leases were entitled to one-half of the oil and gas royalties absolutely and to her dower or distributive share as widow in the other half so long as she should live. To these supplemental answers the plaintiffs excepted, on the ground that if respondents were entitled to such relief, they were so entitled under the original answers and not by reason of anything alleged in their supplemental answers.

The only other pleading which we are called upon to consider is the proposal of the representatives of the defendant F. W. Abney, deceased, to withdraw their former answer and abandon their position taken therein that he was entitled to the royalties of the oil and gas under the parcel allotted to him and J. E. Lewis, and file a new answer in which they assumed the position taken by plaintiffs that they were entitled to a one-sixth part of all the royalties and rentals, regardless of their former position in relation thereto and in relation to said partition.

One of the matters complained of here by Lucy J. Lynch and others, appellants in Case No. 4108, is that after the filing of their answer on May 27, 1919, of which they were never in default, the court, after replications by plaintiffs then filed, were not given time in advance of the final decree entered on that day to make good their answers by proofs. Whether so prejudiced of course depends upon the material of the answers and whether respondents have had the advantage of the evidence in the case taken before the commissioner. The decree of May 27, 1919, we find, provided that any party in interest was to be at liberty to take depositions before any person duly authorized, and to file the same before the commissioner as if taken in his presence, and that all testimony taken in the cause, before the commissioner or some other person, might be used before the court for any and all purposes in determining any of the issues involved in the controversy.

On the first point of error in the decree of May 27, 1919, relied on as defensive in the answers of appellants in Case No. 4108, namely, that the decree of partition was res adjudicata and conclusive of the rights of all parties, this proposition was fully disposed of adversely to appellants' present contentions in the decree pronounced here on the former appeal. That decree was pleaded, and its effect as an adjudication of the rights of the parties to the oil and gas was presented by the demurrer to the bill and adjudicated by the decree pronounced here; its legal effect as a partition of the oil and gas produced under the existing leases was denied and adjudicated in favor of plaintiffs. The answers, therefore, in so far as they affirm the conclusiveness of that decree amounted to no more than a renewal of the demurrer to the bill. Lawrence v. Montgomery Gas Co., 99 S. E. 497.

[3] The next inquiry is, was there an agreement between the partitioners at the time of the partition respecting the oil and gas to be produced under the existing leases, that the same was to be included therein as pleaded in the answers? Respondents complain by their second point of error that they were not given time to take testimony on this part of their defense. The record shows no motion for a continuance to take testimony. If defendants had desired a continuance to give them time to take evidence, good practice required that they should have moved the court for a continuance. McLaughlin v. Sayers, 72 W. Va. 364, 78 S. E. 355; Cross v. Cross, 56 W. Va. 185, 49 S. E. 129. No such motion appears in the record.

[4] But they did later take evidence on this question of the supposed agreement between the partitioners as to the scope of the partition. We may look to that for the purpose of determining whether such an agreement was actually made. The evidence taken by respondents on the question of this supposed agreement consists of that of James A. Lynch, husband of Lucy J. Lynch, J. M. Lewis, and of O. M. Chambers, one of the commissioners, who participated in the partition of the lands. This evidence mainly relates to some loose conversation of C. W. Campbell objecting to the proposed allotment of a child's share of the land in fee to Mrs. Lewis, the widow of Edward Lewis, and cautioning the commissioners to be careful as they might give some of the heirs the advantage over the others in respect to oil and gas; and the question of oil and gas was talked about by one or two of the two or three partitioners present at one or the other of the two meetings of the commissioners preliminary to making the partition. But there is nothing in any of the testimony showing any reference to the existing leases on the land, nor that any of these conversations had any application to the existing leases, and certainly there is nothing therein amounting to an agreement between all the numerous partitioners specifically agreeing that the partition of the land should include the oil and gas covered by the existing leases. Not all, but only two or three of the partitioners are shown to have been present. Some were infants; some of Campbell's children were infants. If the legal effect of the decree was not to divide and partition the oil and gas covered by the outstanding leases, we do not see how these conversations with the commissioners could operate, either in law or equity, to estop the partitioners from their right and title to the oil and gas that might be produced under the leases of those lands. To be effective such a supposed agreement would necessarily have to be binding on all, else on none of them. 1 Herman on Estoppel, p. 14, § 20; 2 Id. p. 921, § 793. See, also, cases cited in 5 Enc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Rep. 201.

[5] Moreover, it is very doubtful whether the facts constituting the supposed estoppel are sufficiently pleaded, for to be available they must be pleaded. And our decisions hold that every estoppel, since it concludes one from alleging the truth, must be certain to every intent and is not to be taken by argument or inference. Vanbibber v. Belrne, 6 W. Va. 168, 178; Lorentz v. Lorentz, 14 W. Va. 809, 921; Water Co. v. Browning, 53 W. Va. 436, 442. 44 S. E. 267. In the latter case, approving the doctrine stated in 4 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 263, it is said:

"The estoppel must be certain; and by this is meant, not only that the facts upon which it is based should be clearly proven, but they should not be capable of bearing any other construction than that put upon them."

[6] Another principle of estoppel in pais applicable here is that mere silence will not work an estoppel, and that to effect an estoppel by silence it must appear that the person has full knowledge of all the facts and of his rights, and had an intent to mislead or at least a willingness that the other party might be misled by his attitude. 10 R. C. L. tit. Estoppel, § 21, pp. 692, 693; Hidden, Trustee, v. Mahanes, 119 Va. 116, 89 S. E. 121. And as these authorities say, a person claiming an estoppel must have been misled to his injury, if an estoppel is not declared. There is nothing in pleadings or proofs showing reliance by respondents on acts or representations of plaintiffs or any of the partitioners, nor prejudice resulting therefrom other than that they received the oil and gas royalties and appropriated the whole thereof produced from wells on their particular lots. They expended no money in the production of oil and gas; nor have they otherwise been injuriously affected. True, they will be required to pay to the other partitioners their shares of the oil and gas rentals according to the principles of the decision; but this is not such prejudice as will estop the other partitioners from claiming their shares of the oil and gas produced.

Nor do we see how respondents, as claimed by them in their third point of defense, were prejudiced by the conduct of the plaintiffs and F. W. Abney in notifying the lessees of their purpose to cancel the leases so far as they covered the lands allotted to them, nor in the bringing of suit by them against the oil companies, owners of the leases, to cancel the same. They were defeated in that suit; and besides, how could that proceeding have misled respondents to their injury? To estop plaintiffs in the assertion of their rights, as we have seen from the authorities already cited, defendants must have been led thereby to change their circumstances and act to their prejudice. Nothing amounting to such prejudice is pleaded or proven.

And we do not see how the fact that John E. Lewis or his grantee F. W. Abney, received from the oil companies, lessees, the gas rental of $200.00 per year accruing from the lot allotted to said Lewis in said partition, as affirmed in their fourth point of defense, operated to mislead respondents or any of the other partitioners. They did not in any way change their position with respect to their lots, or spend any money by reason thereof. The Abney estate will be required to account for such gas rentals, as respondents will be required to account for the oil and gas rentals received by them. Nor have respondents been in any way prejudiced by the act of the plaintiff W. O. Campbell, a tenant by the curtesy of his wife, one of said partitioners, and as heir of his deceased daughter, in receiving from the lessees his share of the oil and gas rentals accruing from the wells on the dower lot set off to Mary M. Lewis, widow of Edward Lewis, after her death. As the dower lot had not been partitioned among the heirs of Edward Lewis, Campbell was entitled as such tenant by the curtesy to his share of the oil. It is suggested that the decree of May 27, 1919, is erroneous as to Campbell in giving him forever the share of his wife in the oil and gas from the dower lot to the prejudice of his children, some of whom are infants. His right as tenant by the curtesy of course would end with his death, and the oil from the dower lot would then go according to the law of descents and distributions, and we see no prejudice in any way to respondents and appellants.

The fifth and last ground of defense remains to be considered, namely, that the oil companies, lessees, had recognized said partition, and as wells had been drilled had treated the royalties in the oil and gas produced as belonging to the partitioners on whose lots the wells had been drilled, and that Campbell and the other partitioners had notice thereof and had acquiesced therein until they had found out that said partition had turned out to their disadvantage. So far as the oil and gas companies are concerned, they are protected as against Abney and Campbell by the decree in their favor in the suit brought against them, already referred to, and by the voluntary surrender of any rights as claimed against said lessees. These companies have been dismissed by agreement out of this suit, and there is involved now only the rights of the partitioners to the oil and gas rentals produced and paid over to the partitioners as stated, and there is nothing in the pleadings or proofs showing prejudice to respondents and appellants to which the principles of estoppel can be applied.

We now come to the consideration of the defense sought to be presented by the supplemental answers of the administrator of Mary M. Lewis, deceased, and of respondents Lucy J. Lynch and others. It is said in these answers that by the terms of the leases for oil and gas executed by said Edward and Mary M. Lewis, of April 12, 1900, properly construed Mary M. Lewis, one of the lessees, was entitled in her own right to one-half of the oil and gas royalties and to a dower right in the other half thereof, and that the decree of May 27, 1919, complained of, is erroneous in denying them their rights as heirs of Mary M. Lewis, by giving a portion to Mrs. Campbell or her husband and heirs when she was not an heir of Mary M. Lewis. We think the question was fully presented by the original bill and exhibits. The said leases were fully pleaded and exhibited with the bill, and the demurrers thereto presented fully, without the aid of answers, the question now sought to be presented anew on this hearing. This question was fully adjudicated on the former appeal. Whether the rights of Mary M. Lewis under these leases were rightly or wrongly determined, is a question not now open for consideration; for that adjudication must be respected in any subsequent decree, as the law of this case. Wherefore, we respond to the arguments of counsel predicated on prior decisions of this court, of which Coffman v. Gas Co., 74 W. Va. 57, 81 S. E. 575, is perhaps the latest, that we can do nothing but refer them to the prior decision in this case, point four of the syllabus.

[7] In a reply brief filed by respondents and appellants Lucy J. Lynch and others in Case No. 4108, the absence of Amanda E. Lewis, wife of John E. Lewis, is urged as an additional ground for reversing the decree of May 27, 1919, and affirming the decree of January 23, 1920. This proposition is based on the contract of said Lewis and wife with F. W. Abney, of October 22, 1906, and their deed to said Abney, of April 26, 1907, made pursuant thereto, where there was "reserved and excepted from this deed one-sixteenth part of the oil in said land if any shall be discovered or found therein." It is asserted that the exception or reservation was of a joint interest in favor of both grantees upon the principles announced in Pyle v. Henderson, 55 W. Va. 122, 46 S. E. 791, Beckwith v. Laing, 66 W. Va. 243, 249, 66 S. E. 354, and Coffman v. Gas Co., supra. We do not think these cases have any application to the provisions of this contract and deed. The effect of these instruments was to except from the grant one-sixteenth of the oil in place, which was not granted, leaving the title to this much of the oil in the owner, neither reserving nor granting to the wife anything except her inchoate right of dower in the oil excepted. We do not think she was a necessary party to the suit. Her husband is still living, and the question of her dower right in the oil is not presented by the record, and while her husband is living it could not arise.

[8] This disposes of all the material questions presented by appellants Lucy J. Lynch and others on their appeal in Case No. 4108. We also have the appeal of W. O. Abney and others, representatives of the estate of F. W. Abney, deceased. The court below, in the decree of January 23, 1920, dismissing plaintiffs' bill, denied them the right to withdraw their former answer and file a new one, in which they proposed to take a position respecting the partition of said land different from that assumed by them in their former answer, and to claim the benefits of the decree of May 27, 1919, and share proportionally in the division of the oil and gas rentals with plaintiffs Campbell and others. This new answer sets up reasons which it is assumed by them justify this change of position, namely, the death of F. W. Abney, and the failure of his personal representatives to comprehend or appreciate, until after the commissioner's report was filed, the inequitable results to them of the position taken in their original answer. One fact strongly appealing to a court of equity in behalf of these appellants is that if they should be held to the concessions in their original answer, they would, on the principles of the decree pronounced here, be compelled to account to the other partitioners for about all of the $1,900.00 received by them for royalty or rent for the gas well on their lot, and not be allowed to share in the royalty oils and gas rentals produced from the other lots. The record shows how inequitable this result would be to the Abney estate, and there appears no just reason on principles of estoppel, rules of pleading, or otherwise, why they should not be allowed to share with the other partitioners according to the decree and as reported by the commissioner to whom the cause was thereby referred. This conclusion, we think, is supported by the case of Depue v. Sergeant, 21 W. Va. 326, and in Smith v. Babcock, 3 Sumn. 583, Fed. Cas. No. 13006, cited and approved in the Sergeant Case.

Since the foregoing appeals were allowed and docketed here, John Edward Lewis has appeared and cross-assigned error. His counsel says in his brief that before the Abney estate assumed their new position, he was satisfied to stand by said partition; but now he opposes the decree in favor of said Abney estate, giving to it what would have been his share in all the gas under the whole tract and fifteen-sixteenths of his one-sixth in all the oil therein, for the reason that under his contract with said F. W. Abney, he granted Abney only the gas and fifteen-sixteenths of all the oil under the particular ninety acres allotted to him in said partition. He also insists that his wife Amanda E. Lewis is a necessary party to the suit, and that because of her absence the whole decree should be reversed. We do not see what right John E. Lewis has to complain. By his contract with Abney made before the partition, he and his wife undertook to sell to said Abney "all their interest in the lands belonging to the estate of Edward Lewis, situate on the head of Little Sandy, in Roane County, West Virginia, at the price of twenty dollars per acre, the said interest being an undivided one-sixth ($\frac{1}{6}$). True, by the same contract they also agreed that as soon as partition of said lands should have been made and the interests of the parties therein allotted to them that they would make to said Abney a deed therefor with covenants of general warranty, free from incumbrances or adverse claims, reserving however from said conveyance a one-sixteenth ($\frac{1}{16}$) part of the oil in said land if any should be found therein; but, except for the one-sixteenth of the oil reserved, said Lewis and wife by their contract agreed to sell their interest in the estate in said land; wherefore as the decree gives said Lewis, or does not give to Abney, the one-sixteenth of the one-sixth of the oil under the whole tract, but leaves that one-sixteenth to said Lewis, how can he be heard in behalf of his brothers and sisters whose rights and interests are fixed by the decree of this court and by that of the circuit court, of May 27, 1919, appealed from by them. That Lewis's wife, Amanda E. Lewis, is not an interested or necessary party to this suit, we have already shown in response to the same point made in behalf of Lucy J. Lynch and others.

From the foregoing it manifestly appears that the decree below of January 23, 1920, must be reversed, and the cause remanded, to be proceeded with according to the principles herein adjudicated and further according to the rules and principles governing courts of equity.

PERDUE et al. v. WARD et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 12, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Judgment \S 590(4)—Decree in suit to restrain obstruction of right of way held not to estop same plaintiffs to recover damages for obstruction.

A final decree in an injunction suit, instituted solely for the purpose of inhibiting defendants from obstructing plaintiffs' right of way over defendants' land, and which decree affords that relief only, is not an estoppel to a subsequent suit at law by the same plaintiffs against the same defendants to recover damages caused by the obstruction of plaintiffs' right of way; and especially is this true where the record of the injunction suit discloses that the question of damages for the obstruction was not even mentioned.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Wayne County.

Suit by Orra Perdue and others against Sam Ward and others. Judgment for defendant on demurrer, and case certified. Reversed and demurrer sustained.

O. W. Ferguson, of Wayne, and O. S. Welch, of Huntington, for defendants.

LIVELY, J. Orra Perdue and others instituted an action of trespass on the case against the defendants Sam Ward and Lindsay Ward for damages for obstructing a right of way over the defendants' land to the county road from a tract of 75 acres owned by the plaintiffs in Wayne county. A special plea was interposed by defendants, bringing into the case the record of a former suit between the same parties concerning the same right of way, decided by the Supreme Court and reported in 85 W. Va. 474, 102 S. E. 96, and styled Alice Roberts et al. v. Lindsay Ward et al., which it is urged is res judicata of the right of the plaintiffs to the damages here involved.

The circuit court decided that the decree of the Supreme Court was res judicata of the claim of damages because if the damages were not litigated in the former injunction suit they could have been, and ought to have been; and this is the controlling question certified for decision here.

An inspection of the injunction suit of Roberts v. Ward set up here as a bar to damages discloses that the question of damages was not involved. The only allegation in the bill which has any bearing whatever on the question is that the closing of the right of way by defendants "operates to the great and irreparable injury of the plaintiffs in the use, farming, and occupancy of said tract of land." No damages are sought for or asked in the prayer, and nothing whatever is said about damages in the evidence. Where there is no pleading, there can be no recovery. Allegata and probata must correspond. Riley v. Jarvis, 43 W. Va. 43, 26 S. E. 366. This allegation of "irreparable injury" in the original bill is not a sufficient pleading of damages, and was clearly not intended to be so. It is a mere conclusion. A plaintiff's demand for any specific relief must be set out with reasonable certainty, with facts and circumstances of time, place, and manner, as will fully disclose his demand and inform the defendant of what he has to meet. The facts out of which his demand arises must be stated, and not merely conclusions of law. Zell Guano Co. v. Heatherly, 38 W. Va. 409, 18 S. E. 611. Without proper pleading, no relief can be had. In the bill there was no attempt to plead damages, none were asked, no evidence taken on that question, and no recovery, clearly indicating that the parties and the court considered that this question was in no way involved.

We are not unmindful of the principle that where equity jurisdiction has been obtained all incidental relief may be granted, and the cause retained for that purpose in order to avoid a multiplicity of suits and settle all questions in controversy between the parties growing out of the principal matter in litigation. The court below took the view that, inasmuch as plaintiffs might have so framed their injunction bill as to include damages, might have introduced evidence on that question, and ought to have done both, but failed or neglected to do either, then they should be estopped for that reason. The weight of authority seems to be otherwise. The two actions are separate and distinct. One is for the purpose of preserving an easement free and unobstructed, and to compel the removal of obstructions already placed, peculiarly a subject of chancery jurisdiction; and the other, assessment of damages, peculiarly a question for a jury. The plaintiffs are entitled to their trial by jury preserved to them by the Constitution. In the injunction suit the right of way is the foundation of the action, and not the damages suffered. In many cases of this character no damages are involved, and especially is this true where the obstruction is such as might usurp the right of way by adverse user. Danielson v. Sykes, 157 Cal. 686, 109 Pac. 87, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1024; Swift v. Coker, 83 Ga. 789, 10 S. E. 442, 20 Am. St. Rep. 347; Schmoele v. Betz, 212 Pa. 32, 61 Atl. 525, 108 Am. St. Rep. 345.

The principle governing this case is well stated by the Supreme Court of the United States as follows:

"As we understand the rule in respect to the conclusiveness of the verdict and judgment in a former trial between the same parties, where the judgment is used in pleading as a technical estoppel, or is relied on by way of evidence as conclusive, per se, it must appear, by the record in the prior suit, that the particular controversy sought to be concluded was necessarily tried and determined, that is, if the record of the former trial shows that the verdict could not have been rendered without deciding the particular matter, it will be considered to have settled that matter as to all future actions between the parties; and, further, in cases in which the record itself does not show that the matter was necessarily and directly found by the jury, evidence aliunde consistent with the record may be received to prove the fact; but, even where it appears from extrinsic evidence that the matter was properly within the issue controverted in the former suit, if it be not shown that the verdict and judgment necessarily involved its consideration and determination, it will not be concluded." Steam Packet Co. v. Sickles, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.) 580, 18 L. Ed. 550.

Where a decree in a former suit is pleaded as a bar in a subsequent suit about the same matter, not mere matters of defense, in order to be a bar, it must appear that the matter in the last suit was in issue in the first, and that the pleadings in the first suit were such that the court could have passed upon such matters. State v. McEl-downey, 54 W. Va. 695, 47 S. E. 650. Judge Poffenbarger further illustrates the principle as follows:

"Take, for illustration, an executory contract for the sale of land. Circumstances entirely aside from the validity of the contract may constrain a court of equity to refuse specific performance of it, without declaring it invalid. Thereafter a court of law may entertain an action on it for damages. Here we have the same contract and the same parties, but the former suit would not conclude the latter. The causes of action are not the same. One is the assertion of a claim for damages for a breach of the contract, and the other a claim of right to specific performance." Hudson v. Land & Mining Co., 71 W. Va. 403, 76 S. E. 797.

See this case for a discussion of the principle involved here and citation of cases where it is applied.

"The estoppel of a judgment extends only to the points directly involved in the action and decided, and not to any matter which was only incidentally cognizable or which came collaterally in question, although it may have arisen in the case and have been judicially passed on." 23 Cyc. 1309.

See, also, Henry v. Davis, 13 W. Va. 230; and Western M. & M. Co. v. Virginia Cannel Coal Co., 10 W. Va. 250, where it is held that to make a fact passed on in a former suit res judicata it must have been directly and not collaterally in issue in the former suit, and there decided. Further illustrative of the rule and peculiarly applicable to the question certified is the decision in Piro v. Shipley, 33 Pa. Super. Ct. 278, wherein it is held:

"Where, in a suit in equity to restrain a trespass of a continuing and permanent character, it appears that neither in the pleadings, nor in the evidence, nor in the decree, was any mention made whatever of damages, such suit is not res adjudicata of a subsequent action of trespass to recover actual and compensatory damages for the trespass, the further continuance of which was enjoined in the equity suit."

We are cited to Gilbert v. Boak Fish Co., 86 Minn. 385, 90 N. W. 767, 58 L. R. A. 735, which holds exactly opposite to the decision of the Pennsylvania court just quoted. But it will be observed that this decision was influenced by the code practice adopted by that state, for it is stated therein that the code system of practice was undoubtedly designed to avoid a multiplicity of suits by enabling parties to settle and determine in one action all matters of difference between them arising out of or relating to the same transaction. The bill in the case of Inderlied v. Whaley, 85 Hun, 63, 32 N. Y. Supp. 640, cited, not only prayed for an injunction against the trespasses being committed by the defendant, but sought damages as incidental to equitable relief, and the court held that under a proper state of facts the plaintiff was entitled to all damages sustained up to the time of judgment, and a recovery of damages would be a bar to a future suit for the same damages; that is, the damages accruing up to the time of the decree in the injunction suit. The case of Alderson v. Horse Creek Land Co., 81 W. Va. 411, 94 S. E. 716, is different from the case under consideration. Wingfield held a tax title to the land in litigation, and Shrewsbury, trustee in bankruptcy, representing the former owner from whom the land was sold for taxes, sued to set aside the tax deed as a cloud on the title, which suit was successful, and he, Shrewsbury, trustee, then sold the land at a trustee's sale to Geo. P. Alderson, who proceeded against the defendant Horse Creek Land Company for an accounting for timber and coal taken from the land and for a partition of the land. The defendant set up as a defense, among other things, that it was the owner of the entire lands, and had purchased a title to a part of the lands known as the Levassor title, which had been adjudged to be a superior title to that of Alderson, and that it was the owner of all the lands by reason of adverse possession under the tax deed as color of title. Defendant insisted that the Levassor title was not set up as a matter of defense to the first suit, and that it was not necessary for it so to do in order to get the benefit of it as a defense, and that the said title was not involved upon the former hearing. This contention was denied by this court, which held that it was the duty of the defendant to set up in the first suit all its defenses, otherwise it would be precluded from so doing in the subsequent suit. The opinion says:

"Ordinarily but one opportunity is given a defendant to make defense, and if he fails to present all of the matters which are available to defeat the plaintiff's right in whole or in part, he will be forever barred from thereafter presenting them. This seems to be the well-established doctrine of the authorities cited above."

The authorities cited were to sustain point 1 of the syllabus, which must be read in connection with the facts of that case. The subject-matter in both suits was the title to the land, and the defense set up in the second suit was incident to and came within the legitimate purview of the subject-matter, and it was the duty of defendant to plead that defense in the first suit or forever be barred from asserting it against the plaintiff.

"A judgment is not conclusive of every question which might have been made in the case, as is sometimes erroneously said, but only of matters that had of necessity to be determined before the judgment could have been given." Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 35.

See, also, Allebaugh v. Coakley, 75 Va. 628, where it is held if the cause of action is divisible, or the pleadings involve two distinct propositions, it is competent to show that only one of them was submitted to and passed upon by the jury, where the judgment is relied upon as a bar.

We conclude that the decree in the injunction suit is not a bar to the present suit for damages, and so answer the question certified.

Reversed.

FOREMAN et al. v. GREENBURG et al.
(No. 4120.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 12, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Easements §8(4).—Use by landowner of private way over adjoining tract of another jointly with him held presumptively adverse.

Open, continuous, and notorious use by an owner of land of a private way over an adjoining tract owned by another person, known, acquiesced in, unobjected to, and unprotected by the latter, is presumptively adverse to him and enjoyed under a bona fide claim of right, even though the way is used jointly by both owners as a common outlet from their properties.

2. Easements \S 5—Use of private way over land of another for 10 years held to give title by prescription.

Such use for a period of 10 years, in the absence of proof of circumstances altering its character, ripens into perfect title to an easement over the adjoining land by prescription.

3. Easements \S 8(4)—Way through inclosed lands obstructed by gates presumptively private way; claimant of way through inclosed lands need only prove open, notorious, and known user to establish easement therein.

A way through inclosed lands, burdened or obstructed by gates or bars, is presumptively a private way, notwithstanding its use to some extent by the general public, and the claimant of the way, as a private one appurtenant to his land, is not required to prove some act indicative of an independent assertion of right beyond that shown by his open, notorious, and known user, in order to establish or maintain the easement.

4. Easements \S 41—Extent of easement by prescription determined by extent of user.

When an easement has been acquired by prescription, the extent of the right so acquired is measured and determined by the extent of the user out of which it originated.

Appeal from the Circuit Court, Wood County.

Suit by Alda Foreman and others against Tony Greenburg and others. Decree for complainants, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

William Beard, of Parkersburg, for appellant.

Turner & Brennan, of Parkersburg, for appellees.

LYNCH, J. The reasons assigned in the petition of the defendant in the suit for reversal of the decree granting the prayer of the bill are: The refusal to sustain the demurrer to the bill; the adjudication of an indefeasible title by prescription to an easement of way over defendant's land; and, if any such right existed, the establishment of one having a width sufficient to allow passage thereon of two vehicles moving in opposite directions. As summarized by appellant in his brief, "there is but one question involved" upon this hearing, "and that is whether the appellees' claim to a right of way by prescription has been made to appear," and again "the exact question here is: Can a permissive use of a road over land of one of two owners of adjoining farms, using the right of way jointly as a common outlet, ever ripen into an easement by prescription?" This, he says, "is a fair statement of the appellees' claim to the use of the roadway. It simply takes as true the allegation of the appellees' bill." If this summarization comprehends the issues, it necessarily prescribes the limit of this discussion. Beyond this limitation the investigation need not proceed. Appellant has voluntarily, and it is presumed advisedly, assailed the decree at what he apparently deemed its most vulnerable point.

The land owned by Mrs Foreman, one of the plaintiffs, she acquired by descent from her father, John Small, and he from the heirs of Reuben Spencer by deed, and Spencer from Joseph T. Leavitt also by deed in 1848. The Small land adjoins the land of appellant, the title to which he acquired from the same remote source, though it did not vest in him until the year 1909 by deed of Mrs. Cottingham. Their familiarity with the surrounding circumstances qualified them to speak intelligently and accurately respecting the existence of the controverted roadway, as they saw and knew it many years before appellant's purchase of the tract owned by him. The road was where it now is, they say, when they first became acquainted with Small and Whitlatch. They knew its location and the constant use made of it during the time of the proprietorship of the successive owners after Spencer, whom they did not know and never saw. Their testimony was unshaken when tested by cross-examination, and there was no other attempt to impeach their veracity or contradict their testimony. Besides, the witnesses who spoke for appellant fully and completely corroborate the facts proved by appellees respecting the long and uninterrupted user of the easement through Greenburg's land. The statement of appellant himself is emphatic upon that question, and by his testimony he confirms the existence of the roadway and its continuous enjoyment by both parties, occasionally by others, whose convenience it served in reaching the nearest public highway. It cannot therefore be said that the effort to establish the continued existence and use of the roadway for the requisite 10-year period necessary under the holdings of this court has failed.

[2, 3] The road in question extends for part of its length along the common line of both properties and for the remainder of the distance on, appellant's land. Both tracts are inclosed and the road itself burdened or obstructed by gates or bars and has been used in that condition for many years. Presumptively, therefore, it is a private way. Roberts v. Ward, 85 W. Va. 474, 102 S. E. 96. As in most cases of this character, there is no proof that express permission to use it was ever requested by or granted to appellees, but they and their predecessors in title have used it for more than 50 years, with the acquiescence of the defendant and those through whom he derived his title, and without any objection on the part of any of them until the year 1919, when a dispute arose with respect to a stile over the common fence. What appellant relies on as constituting grants of permission amounted to no more than mere acquiescence and allence on the part of the owners of the servient tract. User of such character is presumptively adverse to the servient owner and enjoyed under a bona fide claim of right, and when continued for a period of 10 years, in the absence of circumstances altering its character ripens into perfect title to an easement by prescription. Roberts v. Ward, 85 W. Va. 474, 102 S. E. 96; Staggers v. Hines, 104 S. E. 768. See, also, Walton v. Knight, 62 W. Va. 223, 58 S. E. 1025; Hawkins v. Conner, 75 W. Va. 220, 83 S. E. 982.

[1] But appellant insists that, as he also has used the way, when necessary and convenient, as a means of access to and from various portions of his farm for agricultural and other like purposes, and jointly with appellees as an outlet to the county road, such promiscuous user precludes appellees from setting up a right of way adverse to him; in other words, that a joint use excludes the possibility of acquiring an easement by prescription under an adverse claim of right. In response to such objection it is sufficient to say that so long as no objection was offered on the part of appellant or his predecessors in title there was no occasion for appellees to assert verbally a right to use the road. "In the absence of proof to the contrary, every trip over the road was an assertion of right. The user itself, for the statutory period of time, 10 years, established prima facie a bona fide claim of right." Roberts v. Ward, cited. Appellees and their predecessors made no request, so far as the record discloses, for permission to use the way, and received none, but continued to use it without objection and with the owner's silent acquiescence. Being a private way or road, every trip over it, therefore, whether on foot, by horse, or wagon, must have been and was under claim of right and necessarily adverse to appellant. Pavey v. Vance, 53 Ohio St. 162, 46 N. E. 898. Indeed, Whitlatch is shown to have recognized on one or more occasions Small's right to pass over the way during their ownership of the adjoining tracts. The cases cited fully sustain the principles upon which our conclusions rest, and repetition of the arguments therein advanced can serve no useful purpose. They fully answer the objection urged against the acquisition of an easement by prescription when the way is used in common by the claimant and owner of the land over which it passes.

Though appellant's right of ownership of the tract is now subject to the dominant right of appellees to use the way across it, yet the former may enjoy the benefit of his land and of the road notwithstanding the right of the latter therein. The only restriction imposed in such cases is that the use of the servient owner must be reasonable and such as will not impair or injure the easement or interfere with its enjoyment by the dominant owner. 19 C. J. tit. Easements, § 226. And the latter should recognize and respect the corresponding rights of the servient owner, by exercising reasonable care in his use of the road so as not to injure or interfere with the due enjoyment and cultivation of the property over which the road extends, closing after him the gates which have long been in use for the purpose of preventing the trespass or straying of cattle and other animals.

[4] That part of the decree requiring the way so acquired by prescription to be of a width sufficient to permit the passage of two vehicles moving in opposite directions seems not to be unreasonable when considered in the light of the evidence. When an easement has been acquired in such manner, the extent of the right so acquired is measured and determined by the extent of the user out of which it originated. Rogerson v. Shepherd, 33 W. Va. 307, 317, 10 S. E. 632; Staggers v. Hines, 104 S. E. 768; District of Columbia v. Robinson, 180 U. S. 92, 21 Sup. Ct. 283, 45 L. Ed. 440; Board v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 119 Va. 763, 91 S. E. 124; 19 C. J. 967. In 1 Elliott, Roads & Streets (3d Ed.) § 193, the author says:

"If the right to the way depends solely upon user, then the width of the way or the extent of the servitude is measured by the character of the user, for the easement cannot be broader than the user."

The testimony shows that the width of one of the gates was 10 feet 8 inches, and since it presumptively bore a close relation to the width of the roadway, the court not unreasonably could designate and define the prescriptive width as it did.

Finding no substantial error, we affirm the decree.

PROPST v. CALHOUN COUNTY COURT et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. April 12, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Highways §93—Certain formalities as to appointment and bond held not to invalidate acts of highway patrolman.

The acts of a highway patrolman are not invalid because the order appointing him does not in terms require him to give bond, or because the bond which he did give was acknowledged before a notary public, or because the records of the county court do not show that his bond had been approved, or because no certificate was issued to him by the clerk of the county court showing his appointment.

2. Taxation §608(2)—Equity may enjoin collection of tax in violation of provision of Constitution.

Equity has jurisdiction to enjoin the collection of a tax levied in violation of a provision of the Constitution.

3. Highways \S 122, 151(1)—Requiring labor on public roads not "taxation"; collection of money from one failing to perform road work not unconstitutional.

To require the inhabitants of a district to perform labor upon the public roads is not "taxation," and the collection of the amount required by law to be paid by any such inhabitant who fails to perform the labor required of him is not in violation of any of the provisions of the Constitution of this state.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Tax—Taxation.]

Certified from Circuit Court, Calhoun County.

Suit by John Propst against the County Court of Calhoun County and others. Demurrer to bill sustained, and case certified. Affirmed.

R. S. Blair, of Harrisville, for plaintiff.

Lorentz C. Hamilton, of Grantsville, for defendants.

RITZ, P. The plaintiff filed his bill in this case for the purpose of enjoining the collection from him of the sum of $8, the amount which he was required by the patrolman of roads in his district to pay in lieu of performing four days labor on the public roads.

It appears from the allegations of the bill that the county court of Calhoun county had by an order appointed H. H. Helney patrolman of roads for Center district of said county and that the said Helney, in accordance with the provisions of law, notified the plaintiff to appear at a certain time and place and perform four days' labor upon the public roads of said district; that the said plaintiff refused to comply with this summons, which fact was noted by the patrolman of roads, and a suggestion issued by a justice of the peace upon the bank account of the plaintiff for the purpose of collecting the sum of $8 in lieu of the four days' labor required of him. He then filed his bill seeking to enjoin the collection of this claim. The circuit court, after sustaining a demurrer to this bill, certified the question of the sufficiency thereof to this court.

Plaintiff insists that he should not be required to pay this sum in lieu of the work required of him upon the roads for several reasons: First, that the patrolman, H. H. Helney, was not required in the order appointing him to give bond as required by law; second, that the bond executed by Helney was not acknowledged before the proper authority, it having been acknowledged before a notary public instead of before the county court; third, that there is no record of the county court showing the approval of the bond; fourth, that no certificate was issued by the clerk of the county court and delivered to the patrolman showing his appointment.

For these four reasons he insists that the patrolman was not an officer at all, and that his action in summoning him to work upon the roads was without authority of law.

[1] It is averred in the bill that the county court did as a matter of fact appoint Helney as patrolman of roads of Center district, and the question raised by the above contentions is: Do the irregularities indicated invalidate his acts as such patrolman? Conceding for the sake of the argument that the order appointing him should have specified therein that he must give a bond, and that it falls in this regard, and that such bond must be taken by the county court and approved by it, and that the record does not show that this was done, and that no certificate showing his appointment was issued to him by the clerk, does this render his acts as such patrolman void? That he was acting under color of authority there can be no question. The county court had actually made the appointment, and he had actually entered upon the duties of the office, and was performing them. That he may not have complied with all of the requirements of the law, or that the county court, or the clerk of the county court, may not have complied with some of the requirements of the law, could not invalidate his acts done in the execution of the duties of the office. Irregularities in the giving of an official bond, or even failure to give an official bond, where the officer elected or appointed enters upon and performs the duties of the office, will not invalidate his acts. He will be a de facto officer. Constantineau on the De Facto Doctrine, \S 137, 138. It is likewise true that one who is in possession of an office in the open exercise of its functions under color of an election or an appointment is a de facto officer, even though such election or appointment may be irregular. Constantineau on the De Facto Doctrine, \S 171. Whether the patrolman in this case was an officer de jure, or only an officer de facto, we need not determine. He was certainly such officer de facto, and his acts as binding upon the plaintiff in this case as though he held the office de jure.

[2] The plaintiff asserts as his reason for going into a court of equity to enjoin the collection of this claim the lack of opportunity to apply to the county court for relief, for the reason that said court, under the law, would not meet until after the money had been collected from him. If, as the plaintiff contends, the attempt to collect this money from him is in violation of the constitutional limitations placed upon the county court, equity has jurisdiction to enjoin the collection of it. Turkey Knob Coal Co. v. Hallan, 84 W. Va. 401, 99 S. E. 849; Simms v. Sawyers, 85 W. Va. 245, 101 S. E. 467.

[3] The principal contention made by the plaintiff is that this is an assessment against him in excess of the amount limited by the Constitution. His averment is that the county court of Calhoun county had already laid a levy of 90 cents on the $100 of taxable property in the district in which he is an inhabitant; that he is assessed with about $2,000 of such taxable property; that the Constitution limits the levy which the county court is authorized to make to 95 cents on the $100 of valuation, and to allow it to collect this $8 in addition to the 90 cents levied would make the total assessment against his property more than $1.30 on the $100 of valuation. If his contention is correct that the requirement that certain of the inhabitants must perform labor upon the public roads is a tax, then it might be in violation of the provision of the Constitution referred to. But is such a requirement in any sense taxation? It has been for a great many years one of the means adopted by the legislative authority for the purpose of maintaining the highways of the country. Proper maintenance of such public roads has always been considered of the greatest public importance to any community. In fact, it may be said that the very life of the people depends upon the highways being maintained in a passable condition, and the duty is imposed upon the public authorities to so maintain them. There are many public duties which the citizen is called upon to perform without compensation, or for very inadequate compensation. Not so very long ago military service was required, whenever the necessity therefor arose, without making any compensation to the citizen furnishing such service. Service on juries has always been required, in some jurisdictions without any compensation, and in most jurisdictions for a compensation very much less than the actual value of the services. Attendance as witnesses is even now required in this state before grand juries without any compensation therefor. It has been held with practical uniformity by the courts construing such requirements as this that labor upon the public roads is of the same character as military service, service on juries, or attendance as a witness, and that it is in no sense taxation; that it is one of the public duties which the citizen owes to his community, and which he may be required by the proper authority to perform. While the tendency of later years has been for the public to make compensation for such services, the power of the Legislature to require them without compensation cannot be denied. It may be that the burden would be more equitably distributed were full and complete compensation made to each citizen for all services rendered by him to the public, but the legislative mind has not yet declared this to be the public policy of the state, and it may be doubted whether existing conditions are such as that such full compensation could be made without unduly embarrassing the administration of public affairs. This question has been before the courts of a number of the American states, and the conclusion we have reached is sustained by the decisions so far as we have examined them. State v. Sharp, 125 N. C. 628, 84 S. E. 264, 74 Am. St. Rep. 663; State v. Wheeler, 141 N. C. 773, 53 S. E. 353, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1189, 115 Am. St. Rep. 700; Short v. State, 80 Md. 392, 31 Atl. 322, 29 L. R. A. 404; Overseers of the Poor of Amenla v. Overseers of Stanford, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 92; Town of Pleasant v. Kost, 29 Ill. 490; Fox v. City of Rockford, 38 Ill. 451; McDonald v. County of Madison, 43 Ill. 22; City of Macomb v. Twaddle, 4 Ill. App. 254; Leedy v. Town of Bourbon, 12 Ind. App. 486, 40 N. E. 640; Johnston v. City of Macon, 62 Ga. 645; Dennis v. Simon, 51 Ohio St. 233, 36 N. E. 832; Barrow v. Hepler, 34 La. Ann. 362; Town of Starksborough v. Town of Hinesburgh, 13 Vt. 215.

Our conclusion is that there is no merit in the contentions set up by the plaintiff to defeat the payment of the charge made against him for his failure to work upon the public roads as required, and the action of the circuit court sustaining the demurrer to his bill is affirmed.

BANK OF MARLINTON v. POCAHONTAS DEVELOPMENT CO. et al.
(No. 4081.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 12, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Judges \S 55—When special judge retires after removal of disability of regular judge, the latter may conduct further proceedings.

Where, because of interest in a cause, the judge of a circuit court cannot properly preside at a trial thereof, and a special judge is elected, and during the prosecution of the cause such disability is removed and the interest of the regular judge in the cause entirely extinguished, and he is dismissed therefrom as a party, and the special judge elected to preside at the trial thereof retires as such special judge, it is not error for the regular judge to conduct the further proceedings therein.

2. Dismissal and nonsuit \S 22—Where debt of nominal plaintiff in lien creditor's suit has been discharged, he may be dismissed.

Where in a lien creditors' suit the debt of the nominal plaintiff has been satisfied and discharged pending the litigation, it is proper for the court to dismiss such nominal plaintiff from the suit, and to order the cause to be further proceeded with for the benefit of the other lien creditors who have come into the suit and asserted their liens.

3. Receivers \S 55—Discharge of special receiver refused until account settled, though appointed by disqualified judge.

Even though a special receiver appointed in a chancery cause may have been so appointed by a special judge, who ought not to have presided because of interest, it is not error to refuse to discharge such special receiver until he has settled his accounts and made disposition of the property and funds in his hands under the order of the court.

4. Reference \S 83—Decree on commissioner's report not improper because commissioner neglected to state nature of notice to parties of completion of report.

It is not error to enter a final decree upon a commissioner's report in a lien creditors' suit because the commissioner fails to state whether the notice which he gave to the parties of the completion of his report was given by mail or personally.

5. Reference \S 100(1)—Final decree may be entered without having accounts of special receiver settled before commissioner, where no exceptions to report.

It is not error to enter a final decree in a lien creditors' suit without having the accounts of a special receiver appointed therein settled before a commissioner, where such special receiver has made a full and detailed report of his transactions to which there are no exceptions. In the absence of any showing that such report is erroneous, the court may confirm the same, and act thereon as though the special receiver's accounts had been settled before a commissioner.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pocahontas County.

Suit by Bank of Marlinton, for itself and others who might join, against the Pocahontas Development Company and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Hoover, of Webster Springs, for appellant.

F. R. Hill and Andrew Price, both of Marlinton, for appellees.

RITZ, P. This is a lien creditors' suit brought by the Bank of Marlinton on behalf of itself and all other lien creditors of Pocahontas Development Company, for the purpose of subjecting to sale in satisfaction of the liens against it the real estate of said company.

After several years spent in an endeavor to have an account of the liens taken and the land owned by the company ascertained, a decree of sale was finally entered, to review which this appeal is prosecuted.

No contention is made by the defendant Pocahontas Development Company that the liens are not valid, or that it is not the owner of the property, or that it should not pay its debts, but every technical defense known to the law has been taken advantage of during the progress of the litigation to delay the same, and to prevent sale of the property in satisfaction of the liens, and the fictitious and insubstantial character of the errors assigned upon this appeal but emphasize this purpose upon the part of the defendant. No brief is presented on behalf of the appellant in this court, and we might very well say that it has abandoned its assignments of error made in the petition, being of the opinion upon further consideration that the same were lacking in merit. We have determined, however, to consider them and decide the questions raised by the assignments of error, in view of the fact that a decision of at least some of them may be necessary in the further prosecution of the suit in the lower court.

[1] The first error assigned is that the decrees entered by the regular judge of the circuit court, including the decree of sale appealed from, should be reversed because said judge was a party to the litigation, and could not properly enter such decrees. It appears that when the suit was originally instituted the lands of the debtor had been returned delinquent and sold for the nonpayment of the taxes assessed against the same, and that the purchaser at such tax sale subsequently was elected judge of the circuit court of Pocahontas county. The defendant had not redeemed the lands from this delinquency, and because of his interest therein as such purchaser such judge was made a party defendant to the suit. When the suit came on for a hearing an order was entered showing the impropriety of the judge sitting in the case, and directing that a special judge be elected. This was done, and this special judge qualified by taking the oaths prescribed by law, and entered a decree of reference. He likewise, on motion of some of the lien creditors, acquiesced in by the defendant debtor, appointed a receiver to take charge of the real estate, some of which was improved, and to collect the rents therefrom, pay the taxes thereon, and hold the same pending the further order of the court. Shortly after the institution of the suit the land was redeemed from the delinquency for which it had been purchased by the judge of the court, and he no longer had any interest therein. A decree was entered in the suit showing the redemption of the land from this delinquency, and further showing that the defendant purchaser, who was the judge of the court, was no longer interested in the litigation, and dismissing him as a party to the suit. Thereafter, the special judge entered an order, showing that there was no longer any necessity for him continuing as judge in the case, and vacating his office as special judge, and thereafter the regular judge of the court presided during the progress of the litigation. Further than this, the order entered in the cause, showing that there was no further necessity for the special judge acting, and discontinuing his functions as such, was agreed to on the record by the defendant debtor. It will be seen from the foregoing that at the time of the entry of the decree of sale complained of the judge of the circuit court of Pocahontas county had absolutely no interest in this litigation. His interest had been determined and a decree entered so deciding and dismissing him as a party to the cause, and there was no reason, when the special judge who had been elected declined to proceed further with the cause, as shown by the order, for the election of another special judge. The contention that the regular judge was in any wise disqualified at the time he entered the decree of sale because of interest is without merit, for the reason that the statement that he was then interested in the cause is not supported by the record, and for the further reason that the defendant itself agreed that the cause should be further heard by such regular judge. It does not come with very good grace from it at this day to object to his entering these decrees after it had solemnly agreed that he should preside at all further hearings in the suit.

[2] The second and third assignments of error go to the action of the court in dismissing the plaintiff, Bank of Marlinton, from the suit and ordering it to proceed for the benefit of the other lien creditors who had filed answers and asked that their liens be enforced. It appears that during the progress of the litigation the debt of the Bank of Marlinton was paid off, and it was no longer interested. Upon this fact being made known to the court, and upon the motion of the said Bank of Marlinton it was dismissed from the cause, and the suit ordered to proceed for the benefit of all other lien creditors who had filed answers and asked to have the benefit of said suit. Objection is made that the order did not formally make these other lien creditors plaintiffs, and, further, that it was error to dismiss the Bank of Marlinton from the suit, thus saving it from liability for costs which might thereafter be incurred. There is nothing in this contention. There was no reason for longer continuing the Bank of Marlinton as a party to the suit when its debt was fully satisfied, and it would have been entirely improper, as we have held, to dismiss the suit because the debt of one lien creditor was satisfied. By the very provisions of the statute all lien creditors are parties plaintiffs, and the fact that the order did not in so many words make the other lienors who had filed answers in the cause parties plaintiffs does not change their status. The statute makes them parties plaintiffs in the suit, and the effect of the court's order in directing that the litigation should thereafter proceed for their benefit made them parties plaintiffs and responsible for any costs thereafter incurred. Linsay v. McGannon, 9 W. Va. 154; Bilmyer v. Sherman, 23 W. Va. 656; First National Bank v. De Berriz, 105 S. E. 900.

The fourth assignment of error is that the order for the election of the special judge was entered upon the law side of the court, while this cause was and is a chancery cause. We do not know whether the statement is true that the order providing for the election was entered upon the law side of the court, but whether true or not it appears from this record that it was also entered in this suit as one of the orders made during the progress thereof, and the fact that it also may have been entered upon the law side of the court would not have the effect of invalidating the election of the special judge.

[3] The fifth assignment of error is based upon the refusal of the court to discharge the special receiver who had been theretofore appointed by the special judge, upon the ground that said special judge was disqualified to act as such, because he was a stockholder and director of a bank which was one of the judgment creditors in said suit. This motion was not made for several years after the special receiver had been appointed and had qualified, after he had collected considerable sums of money from rents from the property, and from sales of certain of the property, which sales were made by said special receiver by agreement of the appellant entered of record. The motion was made when the case was ready for final decree, when there was nothing further for the special receiver to do except to pay over the money found in his hands as directed by the court and preserve the property until sale thereof could be made by special commissioners who were appointed for that purpose. It is perfectly patent that the court should not have discharged the special receiver at that time, for the very good reason that such action would have left a considerable sum of money in his hands undisposed of, and to discharge him would only have made necessary the appointment of some one else to preserve the property until the same could be sold. Such special receiver made a full and complete report at that time of all of his transactions, showing what funds had come into his hands and from what sources, and what disposition he had made of them so far as they had been paid out, and what balance he still held. There were no exceptions to this report by any party, and the court very properly directed him to pay the balance in his hands, after allowing him certain compensation, to which there is no objection, upon the lien first in order of priority. This was the proper disposition to be made of this fund; and, of course, in the natural course of the suit, when the special receiver has done this and reported that fact to the court, he will be discharged. Whether the special judge was so interested as to make it improper for him to appoint such special receiver we need not inquire. No suggestion of the interest of such special judge was ever made until after the special receiver had acted under the decree by the agreement and with the assent of the appellant here. No purpose could have been served by discharging the special receiver at the time his discharge was asked for. In fact, it would have been entirely improper to discharge him until he had made settlement of his accounts and paid over the fund in his hands. Clearly this motion was made at the time it was for no other purpose than to embarrass the creditors in the further prosecution of the suit, for it could not be to the judgment debtors' interest to have a receiver discharged who had a considerable sum of money in his hands applicable to the liens.

The sixth assignment of error relates to the disability of the regular judge on account of his interest in the suit, and has been disposed of by what we have heretofore said.

The seventh assignment of error is to the action of the court in overruling appellant's exceptions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 8, and 9 to the commissioner's report. We will take these exceptions up in their order. The assignment is not well taken so far as exception

No. 1 is concerned, for the very good reason that the appellant's exceptions, indorsed to the commissioner's report, show that there was and is no exception No. 1.

[4] The second exception insists that it was error to act upon the report of the commissioner, because such commissioner failed to certify the time and manner of giving notice to the attorneys of record of the completion of the report. The certificate of the commissioner attached to his report shows that he completed it on the 24th of September, 1919, and on that day gave notice to the attorneys of record, naming them. Section 7, c. 129 (Code 1913, sec. 4852), provides that such notice may be given verbally or in writing. The commissioner does not show whether he gave it verbally or in writing. The exception does not intimate that such notice was not in fact given, but it is contended that the report should not be received because the commissioner did not show in which way he gave such notice. It is apparent that there is no merit in this exception. The notice was given in one way or the other, and the parties do not complain that they did not have the notice, and it is not very material that the commissioner should state in his report whether he gave the notice by mail or personally. The rights of no party could be injuriously affected because of this failure.

The third exception is to the action of the court in dismissing the Bank of Marlinton from the suit and ordering it to proceed for the benefit of other lien creditors. What we have before said sufficiently disposes of this exception.

[5] The fourth and fifth exceptions are based upon the failure of the commissioner to settle the accounts of the special receiver. The commissioner was not directed in the decree of reference to settle these accounts. The special receiver filed in the cause a very complete and detailed report of all his transactions, and no exceptions are taken to this report by any party. We can see no reason why expense should be incurred in having the commissioner go over the special receiver's accounts in the absence of some suggestion that there was something wrong therewith, or some necessity therefor. The court could and did enter a decree upon the report of the special receiver disposing of it and directing the application of the fund still remaining in the hands of such receiver. To have required the commissioner to settle the accounts of the special receiver would only have caused delay and added additional expense to the litigation, and would have accomplished no beneficial purpose.

The eighth exception goes to the action of the commissioner in reporting a judgment in favor of L. M. McClintic, special receiver, against the appellant, it being asserted that the commissioner made certain findings in regard to this judgment not necessary for the determination of this cause. Whether this is true or not we need not inquire. Such findings or inquiries as were made by the commissioner beyond the necessities of the case are unimportant. He did ascertain and report the material thing to be inquired into, and that was the validity of the judgment and the status of the lien, and this is not questioned.

The ninth exception is based upon the failure of the commissioner to report all of the land owned by the appellant. If it were true that the commissioner did not report all of the land owned by the appellant, there might be something in this exception, but the hypothesis upon which it is based is not supported by the record. The commissioner found that all of the land owned by appellant was conveyed to it by a deed from John T. McGraw, dated the 28th of September, 1891, purporting to convey 620 acres; that this land was subsequently divided into town lots by a plat recorded in the county clerk's office, and that the part of this 620 acres which the commissioner reports as being owned by the appellant is those lots which remained after excluding therefrom all lots which it had theretofore sold, and which lots or tracts of land were situate in the town of Marlinton, Edray district, Pocahontas county, W. Va. Then each of said lots is set out by number and section. From this it sufficiently appears that the land reported is all of the land of the defendant.

This disposes of all of the assignments of error made. We find no merit in any of them, and the decree complained of is affirmed.

LINDENBURG v. AMERICAN RAILWAY EXPRESS CO. (No. 4221.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 19, 1921. Rehearing Denied
May 10, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Carriers \S 158(2), 218(1)—Interstate carrier held liable for full loss or damage to live stock and other property except baggage unless exoneration and a limited liability based on a declared or agreed valuation are effected.

Under the act of Congress passed August 9, 1916 (section 7976, Barnes' Federal Code [U. S. Comp. St. \S 8604a]), known as the "Second Cummins Amendment" to the Interstate Commerce Act, a common carrier is liable for the full actual loss, damage, or injury to ordinary live stock received by it for shipment in interstate commerce, caused by it or any connecting carrier to which it is delivered, and for such loss, damage, or injury to any other property so received, except baggage, unless, by the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission and itself, exoneration from such liability and adoption of a limited one, based upon a declared or agreed value, are effected.

2. Carriers \S 158(2)—Carrier liable for full actual loss, unless shipper's written declaration of value or agreement on released value be taken, notwithstanding adoption by Interstate Commerce Commission of regulations for limited liability or filing of rates by carrier.

Even though the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the authority conferred upon it by said statute, has adopted and promulgated regulations by which such limitation of liability may be effected as to all property in interstate shipment, except ordinary live stock, and in compliance with such regulations a carrier has filed and published and put into effect its tariffs and rules for maintenance of rates dependent upon value declared in writing by the shipper or agreed upon in writing as the released value of the property, approved by said commission, it remains liable for such full actual loss, damage, or injury, in the case of any particular shipment, unless it takes from the shipper a written declaration of the value of the property, or a written agreement with him upon the released value thereof, signed by him.

3. Carriers \S 158(2)—Receipt by carrier containing no statement of value signed by shipper held not to relieve carrier from liability for full actual value, even though rate charged same as would have been charged upon minimum value under Interstate Commerce Commission rules.

In such case the delivery to the shipper, of a receipt executed by the carrier, in which there is no statement of value signed by the shipper, does not relieve the latter from liability based upon full actual value, even though the rate charged for carriage of the property is the same as would have been legally charged upon the minimum value of the property, under the regulations and tariffs validly promulgated, posted, and maintained.

4. Carriers \S 82(2)—Second Cummins Amendment to Interstate Commerce Act not in conflict therewith when interpreted to require receipt from shipper in declaring value.

So interpreted, said statute does not conflict with the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act (U. S. Comp. St. \S 8564, 8565), inhibiting preferences and unjust discrimination, nor is it inconsistent with them, or either of them.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. Carriers \S 13(2)—"Unjust discrimination" defined.

"Unjust discrimination" is different treatment of persons of the same class, under like or similar conditions.

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Action by A. J. Lindenburg against the American Railway Express Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

A. M. Hartung, of New York City, and Davis & Davis, of Charleston, for plaintiff in error.

Morgan Owen, of Charleston, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The judgment here involved stands upon the theory of liability of the plaintiff in error, for full value of property intrusted to it for transportation from Indianapolis, Ind., to Charleston, W. Va., and lost in shipment, by reason of failure on its part to comply with provisions of the federal statute, authorizing express companies to limit their liability, on the basis of declared or agreed value, and known as the "Second Cummins Amendment." Barnes' Fed. Code, § 7976 (U. S. Comp. St. § 8604a). The issues of fact were tried by the court in lieu of a jury, and the substance of the evidence was made a part of the record.

The shipment consisted of two trunks weighing, respectively, 200 pounds and 100 pounds and a 10-pound package. On delivery at Charleston, the 200-pound trunk was in bad condition, some of the goods in it having been totally destroyed and others badly damaged by water, in some way. As proved and found by the court the damages amounted to $916.15. On the theory of compliance with the law and validity of the tariff regulations and receipt given, the defendant admitted liability in the sum of $110, tendered that amount, and denied liability for anything more.

The charges paid were such in amount as would have corresponded with a declared or released value of 50 cents per 100 pounds, the ordinary or basic value of property, with some exceptions, as fixed for purposes of transportation by the Interstate Commerce Commission regulations, and the uniform receipt prescribed by that commission, in the absence of a specification of a higher value. The receipt given the shipper, however, was not in the form of the uniform receipt so prescribed and in use at the time of the shipment. It was an old form in use under former law, known as the "First Cummins Amendment" (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8592, 8604a) or the "Carmack Amendment" (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa). It absolved the company from loss or damage by default or negligence occurring beyond its own lines, and contained no declaration or release of value in writing, signed by the shipper, which the law in force at the date of the shipment required.

[1] It is unnecessary to inquire and determine whether the plaintiff in error had been specifically or expressly authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission to avail itself of the law authorizing limitation of its liability, since we are clearly of the opinion that, if authorized so to do, it omitted to avail itself of the right of limitation, in respect of the shipment in question, by its failure to comply with the regulation provided for effectuation thereof.

Having declared that all common carriers engaged in interstate commerce should be liable for the full actual loss, damage, or injury to property received by them for transportation in such commerce, occurring on their own lines or those of connecting carriers, the statute provides for partial limitation of such liability, as to some kinds of property, under certain circumstances. In the case of ordinary live stock, there can be no limitation. Liability for such full value does not apply to baggage. Nor does it apply to any other property, save ordinary live stock, that the Interstate Commerce Commission may see fit, in the exercise of its discretion and powers, to require or authorize to be carried upon rates dependent upon "the value declared in writing by the shipper or agreed upon in writing as the released value" thereof. In other words, no property can be carried upon such rates and under such a limitation, except baggage and such other property as the Commission requires or authorizes to be so carried. When there is an acceptance of property that has been required or authorized to be so carried, and the value thereof has been so declared or agreed upon, the liability of the carrier is limited to such value.

Under the authority thus conferred upon it, the Interstate Commerce Commission has authorized all property other than ordinary live stock to be carried at rates dependent upon such declared or agreed values and limited liability. That the property involved here could have been so carried is beyond doubt, and it also falls within the class authorized to be carried on a value not exceeding $50 for a shipment of 100 pounds or less, or not exceeding 50 cents per pound actual weight for a shipment in excess of 100 pounds, unless a greater value is declared or agreed upon in writing.

For some reason presumptively found in necessity or expediency, the statute requires the declaration or agreement as to value to be made in writing, or rather does not authorize carriage under limited liability, nor the Commission to provide for it, except upon a written declaration or agreement as to value. In its prescription of the uniform receipt, the Commission has observed this requirement, by providing spaces for the value and the signature of the shipper. It has also interpreted the statute as requiring the carrier to give the shipper an opportunity to elect what value he shall declare, whether that specified in the classification for use in the absence of a declaration of any other, or some higher valuation, imposing upon him a higher rate for transportation. In other words, the receipt contemplates a declaration of value by the shipper, or an agreement with him upon the value in every instance. This seems to be the only interpretation of which the statute is fairly susceptible. It does not authorize either the Commission or the carrier to fix values. It says property may be authorized to be carried upon "rates dependent upon the value declared in writing by the shipper or agreed upon in writing as the released value of the property."

[2, 3] As, in this instance, the carrier did not take from the shipper a written declaration of value nor a written agreement as to value, signed by him, it failed to place itself within the requirements of the statute and the regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission prescribed thereunder. In other words, it did not comply with the conditions precedent to its right to carry the property under a limitation of liability. It should have given him a receipt specifying a value fixed by himself, and evidenced by his signature. In doing so, it would have given him the option as to value contemplated by the law. In failing to do so, it denied him that option. Besides, it neglected to avail itself of the right conditionally conferred upon it by the statute and the regulations, by its failure to take his written declaration or agreement as to value. A writing not signed by him, although specifying value, was not a declaration or agreement in writing by him.

Preparation and promulgation of regulations by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the posting of tariffs by the carrier, conforming to such regulations, do not alone limit the liability in any particular case. Although they may be constructive notice to the shipper, the carrier's liability stands on the basis of full actual value, unless limited in the manner prescribed. Such limitation cannot be effected in any other way. McCormick v. Southern Express Co., 81 W. Va. 87, 93 S. E. 1048. As the provision now under consideration was not in the "Carmack Amendment" nor the "First Cummins Amendment," the decisions interpreting and applying them, relied upon in the argument submitted for the plaintiff in error, are not applicable. In American Express Co. v. U. S. Horse Shoe Co., 244 U. S. 58, 37 Sup. Ct. 595, 61 L. Ed. 990, decided under the present law, the shipper signed the written valuation. In Boston & Maine R. Co. v. Piper, 246 U. S. 439, 38

Sup. Ct. 354, 62 L. Ed. 820, Ann. Cas. 1915E, 469, the bill of lading contained an illegal limitation upon which the carrier relied in its defense.

[4, 5] This interpretation does not permit discrimination and preferences forbidden by sections 7885 and 7886, Barnes' Federal Code; sections 2 and 3, c. 104, Act Feb. 4, 1887 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8564, 8565). All of these provisions must be read together. What is authorized by one of them is not forbidden by any other. They are not irreconcilably repugnant. The terms of the section inhibiting preferences are very general. They do not enumerate or define preferences. What another statute legalizes cannot be deemed to be an undue or unreasonable preference. The Cummins Amendment contemplates and expressly imposes liability on the basis of full actual value, unless the carrier limits it to a different basis, by compliance with certain conditions. If, in a practical sense, this statute works discrimination, it is not an illegal discrimination. Unjust discrimination is different treatment of persons of the same class, under like or similar conditions. For the difference in treatment of shippers so affected, there is ample basis in the difference in circumstances. A shipper who has been denied a right which the law requires the carrier to extend to him, respecting the rate he shall pay and the extent of its liability to him, occupies a substantially different position from that of one to whom such right has been accorded. That difference constitutes firm ground for classification in legislation. The purpose of the statute is to give the shipper right in every case to hold the carrier to liability on the basis of actual value, if he desires to do so; but, to avail himself of such right, he must state such value in money in his declaration or agreement, and pay charges based thereon. To effectuate this purpose and adequately guarantee such right to him, it has been deemed necessary to require the carrier, in every instance, to allow him an opportunity to elect what value he will place upon his property, by taking his statement as to it, writing it in the receipt, and requiring him to sign it. Imposition of this duty upon both parties prevents the carrier from fixing the value itself in the great majority of cases, as it did under the "First Cummins Amendment." Hence the provision is a vital one, and stands upon considerations of very great importance.

Upon these principles and conclusions, the judgment complained of will be affirmed.

April 12, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Indictment and Information \S 11(4)—Physicians and surgeons \S 6(9)—Indictment held sufficiently to negative exception and to charge practicing without license.

An indictment which avers that defendant without first having complied with sections 9, 10, and 11 of chapter 150 of the Code (secs. 5343-5345), governing applicants and the issuing of certificates of license to practice medicine and surgery in this state, and without first having obtained a state license so to do, as required by the laws of this state, did unlawfully practice medicine and surgery, as defined in chapter 150, \S 8a.XII (sec. 5342) Supplement 1918 of the Code, sufficiently charges the offense prescribed by the statute, and sufficiently negatives the fact of defendant's being of the first class of practitioners described in said section 9.

2. Indictment and Information \S 11(4)—Indictment for practicing medicine without license held sufficiently to negative that defendant was of first class of practitioners described in statute.

While practitioners of medicine and surgery since the amendment of said section 9 by chapter 22 of the Acts of 1889, have not been required to submit themselves to examination and obtain new certificates of license, nevertheless prior to that amendment and since the amendment and re-enactment of said chapter 150 in 1882 (Acts 1882, c. 93), they have been required to have such certificates of license as a condition of the right to practice medicine and surgery, and the averments of the indictment sufficiently negative the fact that defendant was of the first class of practitioners described in the statute.

3. Indictment and Information \S 11(1)—Indictment for practicing medicine without license need negative exceptions, and not provisos, of the statute.

In an indictment for a statutory offense like the one described, the pleader need negative only exceptions, not provisos, of the statute.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Upshur County.

Minnie Kirkpatrick was indicted for practicing medicine without a license. Indictment quashed, and case certified. Reversed, and demurrer overruled.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., and R. Dennis Steed, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

Young & McWhorter, of Buckhannon, for defendant.

MILLER, J. The circuit court ruled that the following indictment was not sufficient in law, sustained defendant's demurrer thereto, and certified to us the question whether its ruling thereon was correct:

"The Grand Jurors * * * upon their oaths present that Minnie Kirkpatrick, on to-wit: on the ____ day of ____, A. D., One Thousand Nine Hundred and Nineteen, within one year next preceding the date of the finding of this indictment, in the County of Upshur, without having first complied with sections 9, 10 and 11 of Chapter 150 of the Code of West Virginia governing the applicants and the issuing of certificates of license to practice medicine and surgery in the State of West Virginia, and without first having obtained a state license to do so, as required by the laws of the State of West Virginia, did unlawfully practice 'medicine and surgery' as defined in Chapter 150, Section 5342 (8a.XII), Supplement 1918 to the Code of West Virginia. Against the peace and dignity of the State."

Section 9, chapter 150, of the Code in so far as pertinent, is as follows:

"The following persons and no others shall hereafter be permitted to practice medicine in this state: (1) All such persons as shall be legally entitled to practice medicine in this state at the time of the passage of this act. (2) All such persons as shall be graduates of a reputable medical college, recognized as such by the state board of health, who shall pass an examination before said state board of health and shall receive certificates therefrom, as hereinafter provided."

As sections 10 and 11 referred to in the indictment relate to the obtaining and rec-ordation of certificates or licenses issued, and to the proof required of applicants of their educational qualifications to practice, etc., they are not particularly important in the disposition of the case presented.

Section 8a.XII of the said chapter (Code Supp. 1918), being section 12 of chapter 11, Acts 1915, defines the term "practice of medicine and surgery" as used in the act as "treatment of any human ailment or infirmity by any method," and says that

"to open an office for such purpose or to announce to the public in any way readiness to treat the sick or afflicted, shall be deemed to engage in the practice of medicine and surgery within the meaning of this act."

Section 15 of said chapter (sec. 5348), being section 15 of chapter 150 of the Code as amended and re-enacted by chapter 93, Acts 1882, defining the offense charged in the indictment, provides:

"If any person shall practice, or attempt to practice, medicine, surgery, or obstetrics in this State, without having complied with the provisions of section nine of this chapter, except as therein provided, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and fined for every such offense, not less than fifty nor more than five hundred dollars, or imprisoned in the county jail not less than one month nor more than twelve months, or be punished by both such fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court."

[1] The first proposition relied on by the defendant to sustain the ruling of the court below is that neither sections 9, 10, or 11 of said chapter 150 of the Code applies to the remedial or inhibiting clauses of said chapter, but relate solely to the procedure or methods prescribed for applicants to obtain licenses to practice medicine and surgery, and that chapter 11 of the Acts of 1915 (Code Supp. 1918, c. 150, 8a.I to 8a.XIII [secs. 5342a-5342m]) in no way purports to amend chapter 150 of the Code, which prescribes penalties for violation of this statute. We find however that chapter 11 of the Acts of 1915 does by the last provision thereof undertake to repeal all acts and parts of acts inconsistent therewith, wherefore, sections 9, 10, 11 and 12 of said chapter 150 of the Code as previously existing are superseded by the provisions of the act of 1915, so far as repugnant thereto. Section 12 of chapter 11 of the Acts of 1915 specifically provides that:

"The examination of applicants and the issuing of certificates of license thereto shall be governed by sections nine, ten and eleven of chapter one hundred and fifty of the Code of West Virginia," etc.

Moreover, counsel are mistaken in saying that the indictment is under sections 9, 10 and 11 of said chapter 150. It does recite that defendant without having first complied with said sections governing applicants and issuing certificates of licenses committed the offense, but it also charges that defendant "without having first obtained a state license to do so, as required by the laws of the State of West Virginia, did unlawfully practice 'medicine and surgery' as defined in chapter 150, section 5342i, (8a.XII) Supplement 1918 to the Code of West Virginia," the latter section being said section 15 of chapter 150 as amended and re-enacted in 1882. So that the effect of the indictment was to charge defendant with violation of said penal provision of section 15 against practicing medicine and surgery without a license as therein provided.

[2] The second proposition and the one mainly relied on is that the indictment fails to negative the right of defendant to practice medicine and surgery under the condition named in the first clause of section 9, namely, that she was not of the class of practitioners who were legally entitled to practice at the time of the passage of the act. Who were the persons entitled to practice medicine and surgery "at the time of the passage of this act"? This language was brought into chapter 150 the first time by the amendment to section 9 thereof by chapter 22 of the Acts of 1889. Three specific classes are there described, the second being:

"All persons not graduates in medicine, but who have practiced medicine in this state under a certificate issued by the state board of health, prior to the passage of this act, are authorized to practice medicine in all its departments in this state."

This act gave the right, first, to graduates of medical colleges; second, to those not graduates but who had previously obtained licenses from the state board of health; third, to those not belonging to either of the other classes, who should before practicing be examined and obtain a certificate to practice from the state board of health. So the second class in the act of 1889 became the first class by the amendment of the same section by chapter 7 of the Acts of 1895, and remained so by the same description in the amendment thereof by chapter 66 of the Acts of 1907, the same now contained in the Code (sec. 5343), since which time this section has not been amended. It is manifest therefore that since the amendment of section 9 in 1889 no person of the first class in the present statute was entitled to practice medicine and surgery without a certificate of license. This being so, does not the averment of the indictment that the defendant unlawfully practiced medicine and surgery without having first obtained a state license sufficiently negative the fact that defendant was of the first class as well as of the second class? In either case, if she had not procured a license in the manner pointed out in the statute, she would be guilty of violation of said section 15 of chapter 150.

[3] All other provisions of the statute relied on, under which defendant would protect herself, are covered under provisos and are clearly defensive. The pleader need negative exceptions only, not provisos. State v. Richards, 32 W. Va. 348, 356, 9 S. E. 245, 8 L. R. A. 705.

But it is argued that since the act of 1889 practitioners were not required to have a license to practice medicine. This is not a proper construction of the provision of that act. Always since 1882 a practitioner has been required to have a license or certificate; since then if he had a license issued prior to that time he was not required to submit to an examination or procure a new or additional license; but at no time since 1882 has anyone been entitled to practice medicine without a license or certificate from the proper authority.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the court erroneously quashed the indictment, and that its rulings thereon should be reversed and the demurrer overruled. Our response will be so certified.

HOPE NATURAL GAS CO. v. JARVIS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 22, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Mines and minerals \S 79(7)—Recovery of delay rentals paid under leases held proper under special count in assumpsit alleging payment and partial failure of title.

Recovery of money paid as delay rentals under oil and gas leases, upon a consideration that has partially failed by reason of lack of title in the lessor, to part of the land embraced by the leases, may be had upon a special count in a declaration in assumpsit, alleging payment of the rentals and such partial failure or lack of title, in addition to the other admittedly necessary allegations.

2. Mines and minerals \S 79(7)—Allegations to recover delay rentals paid held sufficient for recovery of damages for breach of covenant for peaceable and quiet enjoyment under oil and gas lease.

If, in such count, there is a further allegation of adjudication against the lessee, of such lack of title, and partial cancellation of the lease, it is sufficient for recovery of damages for breach of the covenant for peaceable and quiet possession of the leased premises, implied in the lease.

3. Decisions compared.

There is no inconsistency between the principles enunciated in Philadelphia Co. v. Shackerford, 83 W. Va. 280, 98 S. E. 568, on the one hand, and those stated in Knotts v. McGregor, 47 W. Va. 566, 35 S. E. 890, and Gaffney v. Stowers, 73 W. Va. 420, 80 S. E. 501, and other similar cases, on the other hand.

Certified from Circuit Court, Calhoun County.

Action by the Hope Natural Gas Company against O. A. Jarvis, administrator. A demurrer to the declaration was overruled, and case certified. Affirmed.

A. B. Fleming, Charles Powell, and Kemble White, all of Fairmont, for plaintiff.

A. G. Mathews and Lorentz O. Hamilton, both of Grantsville, for defendant.

POFFENBARGER, J. On the joint application of the parties to this action, the trial court has certified to this court, for review, its interlocutory order overruling a demurrer to the declaration and each count thereof.

The action is in assumpsit, and for the recovery of portions of delay rentals paid under oil and gas leases on the theory of breaches of implied covenants of the leases and failure of consideration, it having been ascertained and judicially determined, long after the date of the lease and payment of the rentals, that the lessors had no title to certain portions of the leased lands. The declaration contains the common counts and two special counts.

In so far as it goes to the entire declaration and the common counts, the demurrer was properly overruled. Their sufficiency is admitted. At any rate, it is not questioned in the argument.

[1-3] The first special count is based upon a lease of 750 acres of land, for oil and gas purposes, dated April 15, 1909, which seems to have taken the place of an older lease of the same land, dated October 27, 1899; each lease having been given for a term of 10 years, and the later one having been intended to go into effect or to replace the earlier one, only in the event of the expiration thereof by reason of failure to produce oil or gas on the land within the term specifically stipulated for. The second is based upon the same kind of a lease of a 200-acre tract, bearing the same date, and made in view of the probable expiration of a former lease of the tract, bearing date October 27, 1899. Said first special count alleges failure of title in the lessors to two portions of the 750 acres, one of which contains 65 acres and the other 95½ acres. The second alleges such failure as to 125 acres of the 200-acre tract. In these three tracts, 65 acres, 95½ acres, and 125 acres, one of the lessors had only an estate for his life and the other none at all. They had belonged to a deceased wife of W. H. Campbell, whose subsequent wife, Elizabeth Campbell, joined him in the two leases. After the death of W. H. Campbell, an assignee of one of the former wife's heirs, instituted and successfully prosecuted a suit in equity for partition of the said three tracts of land, and for cancellation of the leases in question as constituting clouds upon the title of the plaintiff in said suit and the heirs of the deceased wife.

As to the 750-acre tract of land, the plaintiff covenanted in the lease to complete a well thereon, on or before October 27, 1909, or to pay to the lessors, in advance, $187.50 for each period of three months during which the completion of such well should be delayed. It was further provided that payments of the delay rentals might be made direct to the lessors, their heirs or assigns, or deposited to their credit in the Bank of Grantsville, or by checks mailed to W. H. Campbell at his post office. Thirteen of such payments were made to W. H. Campbell, within his lifetime. After his death, which occurred in October, 1912, and which was not known to the lessee, for some time thereafter, 5 quarterly payments were placed to his credit in the Bank of Grantsville. After knowledge of his death, 8 additional payments were made, by deposit in said bank to the credit of Elizabeth Campbell and the devisees of W. H. Campbell, which last-mentioned 13 payments, amounting to $2,437.50, the administrator with the will annexed of said W. H. Campbell accepted and withdrew from said bank. As to the 200-acre tract of land, the provisions of the lease were the same as those of the lease of the 750-acre tract, except as to the amount of the delay rental, which was $50 per quarter. W. H. Campbell, in his lifetime, received and accepted 13 such payments, amounting to $850, and after his death his administrator received and accepted 11 such payments.

Each of the special counts, charges partial failure of consideration, occasioned by lack of title in the lessors, to portions of the leased lands as aforesaid, and breach of the implied covenant that the lessee should have right to enter upon the land and peaceably and quietly possess the same, occasioned by such lack of title, adjudication thereof, and cancellation of the leases. Each of them asserts right of recovery, not of the full amount of the rentals paid, but only of such proportions thereof as the lands lost bear to the entire areas leased. In neither of them is there an allegation of total failure of consideration, nor of a breach of covenant going to the entire tract of land. The bill of particulars conforms to the theory of said counts. It charges payments and interest amounting to $8,069.71, and credits thereon the amounts mathematically apportionable to the lands to which the lessors had good title.

The demurrer to the special counts proceeds upon the theory of inconsistency between the principles declared in Philadelphia Co. v. Shackelford, 83 W. Va. 280, 98 S. E. 568, and those enunciated in Knotts v. McGregor, 47 W. Va. 586, 35 S. E. 899, Headley v. Hoopengartner, 60 W. Va. 626, 55 S. E. 744, Kilcoyne v. Southern Oil Co., 61 W. Va. 538, 56 S. E. 888, Gaffney v. Stowers, 73 W. Va. 420, 80 S. E. 501, and Ford v. Ball, 76 W. Va. 663, 86 S. E. 562, and virtual repudiation of those stated in the last-named cases. The position taken by the defendant involves a manifestly obvious misapprehension of the scope and effect of the decision in Philadelphia Co. v. Shackelford. The declaration in that case contained only the common counts and a special count alleging rescission of the contract and total failure of consideration. It contained no special count charging partial failure of consideration or partial breach of the implied covenant for peaceable and quiet possession. If it had contained such count, right in the plaintiff to recover something would have been upheld. Point 4 of the syllabus, as well as the opinion, distinctly admits right of recovery in such case, upon a proper declaration. In the opinion the decision in Gaffney v. Stowers is referred to without disapproval, and is impliedly approved.

Repetition of the well-grounded principles, arguments, and conclusions set forth and elaborated in Knotts v. McGregor and the subsequent cases above mentioned is altogether unnecessary. Nothing of value can be added. They are clear and emphatic and nothing inconsistent therewith is found in Philadelphia Co. v. Shackelford. It is consistent with them in holding that, in such cases, recovery for partial failure of consideration cannot be had on the common counts, nor upon a special count alleging entire failure of consideration. It is equally consistent with them in impliedly holding that there may be recovery on a special count charging such partial failure of consideration as is alleged in this declaration.

Viewed in the light of these principles and conclusions, the special counts are clearly sufficient for recovery of money paid upon a consideration that has partially failed. They are also sufficient for recovery of damages for breaches of the covenants. A direct adjudication against the lessee of failure of titles of the lessor and the lessee and cancellation of the lease are legally equivalent to an actual ouster from the premises. Knotts v. McGregor, cited; Rex v. Creel, 22 W. Va. 373. The recovery cannot be multiplied by reason of the existence of the two grounds of action, however.

Upon a demurrer to a declaration, it is neither necessary nor proper to enter upon any inquiry as to the measure of damages or the amount of the recovery that may be had. It suffices to say that there is right of recovery of some damages or of some of the money demanded.

In our opinion, the trial court properly overruled the demurrer, and our order will so certify.

LAWRENCE et al. v. MONTGOMERY GAS CO. et al. (No. 4181.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 24, 1921. Rehearing Denied
May 10, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Corporations §191, 298(1)—Quorum of directors or stockholders in regular meeting after due notice necessary for legal corporate action.

Corporate action can not be lawfully expressed or made binding by less than a quorum of directors or stockholders acting jointly in a meeting thereof regularly called and after due notice as provided by law or by-law of the corporation.

2. Attorney and client §70—Attorney appearing and filing pleading presumed to have authority duly conferred.

Where an attorney appears in a cause and files an answer or other pleading, being an officer of the court, he is presumed to have authority, and that what he does in relation thereto has been done with authority duly conferred.

3. Corporations ~~§~~410—Officer's authority to transact ordinary business will not impose liability on corporation for extraordinary contracts.

The authority of the president or other officer of a corporation to transact the ordinary business of the corporation will not imply liability upon the corporation for extraordinary contracts, as the sale and disposition of a material part of its plant or other property owned and employed by it in the conduct of its business.

4. Corporations ~~§~~425(5)—One seeking to estop corporation by conduct of officers or agents must have been misled to his injury.

To estop a corporation by its conduct from denying the authority of its officers or agents, the one seeking to enforce the estoppel must have been misled thereby to his injury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Suit by A. C. Lawrence and others against the Montgomery Gas Company and others. Decree for complainants, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

L. B. O'Neal, of Montgomery, Davis & Davis, of Charleston, Williams, Scott & Lovett, of Huntington, and Koontz & Hurlbutt, of Charleston, for appellants.

W. E. R. Byrne, Fred O. Blue, Maynard F. Stiles, and C. J. Van Fleet, all of Charleston, for appellees.

MILLER, J. On a former appeal in this cause from a decree appointing a special receiver of the property, an alleged contract which plaintiffs sought to have specifically performed, and upon questions certified to us by the circuit court on the sufficiency of defendants' answers, exceptions to which were interposed by plaintiffs, we were of opinion, on the prima facie case then presented, to affirm the decree below appointing the special receiver and to remand the cause for further proceedings. 84 W. Va. 382, 99 S. E. 496.

The basis of our former decision, as will appear from the opinion then delivered and the mandate therewith certified to the circuit court, was that although the answers denied the authority of the officers and directors of the defendant company to enter into the contract in writing with plaintiffs and to execute and deliver in escrow a deed to them for the property sued for, the same being signed, acknowledged and sealed by and on behalf of defendant company by Henderson, its president, swearing that he was thereunto duly authorized, the burden was thereby cast upon the Montgomery Gas Company, regardless of its denial of want of authority of its officers and directors in the premises, to prove such want of authority.

The present appeal is by the Montgomery Gas Company, the Columbian Carbon Company, a subsequent purchaser of the property, and O. J. Henderson and some thirty-eight others, officers, directors and stockholders of the Montgomery Gas Company, from a decree below pronounced on July 20, 1920, specifically executing said contract and setting aside the subsequent deed for the property to the Columbian Carbon Company, pronounced upon full hearing upon bill, answers, replications, and depositions and proofs taken, the evidence principally relating to the main issue of alleged want of authority of the officers and directors who undertook to enter into said contract of sale and to execute and deliver said deed, and also upon the theory of an alleged holding out by said company of its officers and directors as being clothed with such authority estopping them from denying the same.

While the result of our former decision was to place the burden upon the defendants to show want of authority in the officers and directors in the premises, we now perceive that the fact of such lack of authority for want of corporate action being established, the burden would be recast upon plaintiffs to show such holding out or ratification of the unauthorized act as would bind and conclude the principal.

The facts and circumstances attending the entering into said contract and the execution, whether or not, strictly speaking, in escrow of the deed, and what occurred subsequently, with slight colorings in their favor, not affecting the merits of the case, are very clearly stated by appellants' counsel as follows:

"On July 5, 1918, Kennedy appeared in the town of Montgomery and proposed to O. J. Henderson, H. Lane, J. F. Burgess and D. C. Smallridge, four of the nine members of the board, to buy from the company the Burke lot and well for Twenty Thousand ($20,000) Dollars. The board was not in session and was not convened, but as a result of this negotiation, and on the evening of the 25th of July, a written contract was prepared and signed by these four gentlemen in the name of the Montgomery Gas Company (but not under corporate seal), whereby the Montgomery Gas Company agreed to sell Lawrence and Kennedy the Burke lot and well for $20,000, $10,000 to be paid on the signing and delivery of the proper deed, and $10,000 within sixty (60) days thereafter, with interest, to be secured by endorsement approved by seller, this contract providing that the deed was to be delivered as soon as could be prepared. To this contract they affixed the name of the Montgomery Gas Company by O. J. Henderson, Pres., D. C. Smallridge, Secy.-Treas. and director, by H. Lane, director, and by J. F. Burgess, director. On the following morning, Kennedy having remained in Montgomery, there still having been no meeting of the board called or held, the signature of S. S. Wallace, a director, was added, Wallace not being present when any of the others signed, and only one of the parties who had already signed, viz.: H. Lane, being present when Wallace signed, in the store of Lane. Kennedy, at the time of negotiating the contract, stated that the money was on deposit in Kanawha Valley Bank and would be paid as soon as the deed was presented. This was proven by defendants and Kennedy did not testify.

"During the day of July 26, Henderson procured to be drawn a deed, by which the Montgomery Gas Company purported to convey the Burke lot and well to the plaintiffs, and the seal of the company was attached to the deed; it was acknowledged by Henderson in form required of corporations, and Henderson, on the following day, July 27th, brought the deed to Charleston to the Kanawha Valley Bank, to which place plaintiffs had directed him to come with the deed and receive the consideration, the cash and note. No arrangements had been made at the bank for the payment of the money or the receipt of the deed, and Henderson went to the office of plaintiff Lawrence, where Lawrence examined the deed, with his attorney, approved it and requested Henderson to meet him at said bank in the afternoon of that day. At the appointed hour Henderson went to the bank, where he found the money had not been deposited. Later on the same day Lawrence and Henderson went together to the bank, and finding its cashier not there, Lawrence told Henderson that immediately upon the return of the cashier the money would be deposited. Henderson left the deed with the bank with directions to the latter to collect the $10,000 and note as called for and deliver the deed, Lawrence promising immediate payment of the money and assuring that it had been arranged for. Henderson then left the city. The plaintiffs did not make the cash payment or execute the note on July 27th, as they had agreed to do (July 28th being Sunday), or on July 29th.

"On July 30, 1918, Henderson, Lane, Burgess and Smallridge in Montgomery, learning by phone from Kanawha Valley Bank that the deed had not been taken up, called in L. Burke O'Neal, an attorney, and directed him to send to plaintiffs a letter advising them that the contract of July 25th was canceled and the deed withdrawn, since the same was to have been an immediate one, was not a time option, and time was of the essence thereof, and the plaintiffs had wholly refused to comply on their part by passing the consideration and taking up the deed at the time and in the manner agreed upon. This action, like all prior acts of these four gentlemen touching the purported sale to plaintiffs, was taken by them as individuals, no meeting of the board having been held. On the morning of July 30th, about 10:30 or 11:00 o'clock, immediately after Henderson notified the bank not to deliver the deed, Henderson sought to get Lawrence by telephone to give him personal notice, and, though unable to get either Lawrence or Kennedy in person, got and talked with C. J. Van Fleet, the attorney for the plaintiffs in this transaction, owner of an interest in the claim set up by Lawrence and Kennedy in this suit, and who occupied an adjoining and connecting office to that of plaintiff Lawrence, and advised his attorney that the contract was canceled and requested him to notify the plaintiffs. On July 30th, after the O'Neal letter had been dispatched, some stockholders of the company who lived in Montgomery discussed the matter of drilling the Burke well, and at their request a meeting of the board of directors was called for the following day, July 31st, at which these gentlemen intended to propose that the company itself drill the well. H. Lane, one of the directors, began to make inquiries where derricks and machinery for drilling could be found and called on the telephone, among others, the office of the Columbian Carbon Company in Charleston. J. D. Pribble, superintendent of the Columbian Carbon Company, after replying to Lane's inquiries as to derricks, said to Lane that he would like to make an offer for the purchase of the Burke lot by his company, the Columbian Carbon Company. Lane replied that his company was to have a meeting next morning and that he thought they would decide to drill the well. Pribble suggested that he would like to submit a proposition to the company, and Lane replied in effect that it would probably be useless, but that a directors' meeting was being held in the morning of the following day, at which Pribble, if he saw fit, could appear.

"This meeting of the board convened on July 31st, for the purpose of considering drilling to the oil bearing sand the Burke well. Prior to this meeting all members of the board knew of the Lawrence contract. While in session Pribble appeared, was accorded a hearing, and proposed to pay for his company Thirty-Five Thousand ($35,000) Dollars for the lot and well, provided the stockholders of the company should assent. Thereupon the directors at that meeting agreed to accept this offer, subject to the approval of the stockholders, and directed a meeting of the stockholders to be called for and held on the 10th day of August, 1918. On August 10th, the stockholders assembled in meeting. There were present 100,848 shares. A resolution was introduced, which recited the proposition of the Columbian Carbon Company, the said action of the board thereon on July 31st, the institution of this suit by Lawrence and Kennedy to enforce the contract claimed by them, the immediate necessity of drilling lest the oil be drained by wells on adjoining property, authorized and directed the sale to Columbian Carbon Company at $35,000.00 and that this suit be actively defended and the claim of the plaintiffs resisted, and provided that the Columbian Carbon Company should, with dispatch, drill for and save the oil on the lot, and otherwise arranging the details of the sale to the Columbian Carbon Company and the payment by the Columbian Carbon Company of the purchase price when the suit should have been determined.

"This resolution was adopted by a vote of all the shares present except 8300."

The total stock outstanding at the time was 150,000 shares.

The evidence establishing these facts is quite sufficient to show that no corporate action by directors or stockholders preceded the making of the contract to Lawrence and Kennedy.

[1] The law is well settled in this state as elsewhere that corporate action can not be lawfully expressed or made binding by less than a quorum of the directors or stockholders acting jointly in a meeting thereof regularly called after due notice as provided by law or by-law. Indeed this is the proper interpretation or construction of our statute, section 51 of chapter 53 of the Code (sec. 2883), as shown by repeated decisions of this court. In Limer v. Traders Co., 44 W. Va. 175, 28 S. E. 730, we held, third point of the syllabus, that the directors of a corporation can not separately and individually give consent to or make a contract to bind the corporation; they can act only as a body, their power being not joint and several, but only joint. And as said in 3 Thompson on Corporations, § 3906, cited and quoted in our case just referred to, "When they [the directors] are not consulting together as a board, they are regarded as acting privately and unofficially." The rule just stated was affirmed in our cases of Pennsylvania Lightning-Rod Co. v. Board of Education, 20 W. Va. 360, and Smith v. Cornelius, 41 W. Va. 59, 68, 28 S. E. 599, 30 L. R. A. 747, and subsequently recognized also in Griffith v. Blackwater Boom & Lumber Co., 46 W. Va. 56, 64, 33 S. E. 125, and Cunningham v. Board of Education, 53 W. Va. 318, 320, 44 S. E. 129. There is no need of elaboration of this proposition by further reference to the authorities.

It is not contended on this hearing that the individual directors who undertook to sign and execute the contract and deed involved here did so pursuant to any authority of the board of directors thus given. The propositions now relied on are: First, that after learning of the action of these directors, the corporation through its constituted authority was not prompt to repudiate the contract; second, that there was such a holding out by the corporation and board of directors and stockholders of such plenary power and authority by a course of dealing as to estop them from denying authority of the officers and directors who undertook to act in this instance.

On the first proposition, we have the fact that the officers and directors who undertook to make the contract with plaintiffs did, through O'Neal, attorney, promptly notify plaintiffs that because of their failure to comply with the contract, as they interpreted it, it was canceled. It is true, this notice was not put upon the ground of lack of authority, but as their action in the first instance was not taken pursuant to authority of the directors, such notice could hardly be said to be any recognition of the authority assumed by them, by the directors in meeting. But when the directors did meet the following day, they in effect repudiated the contract with plaintiffs by ignoring it and entering into the contract with the Columbian Carbon Company, subject to the approval of the stockholders in a meeting called at the same session, to convene on August 10th following, the earliest day such meeting could be convened; and when the stockholders did meet, they were prompt to repudiate the prior action of the officers and directors who had undertaken to act in the premises, and authorized this suit to be vigorously defended.

[2] Moreover, in the answer of the defendant company to the bill, under the seal of the corporation, and sworn to by Henderson, President, filed on August 7th, and signed by counsel, want of authority of these officers was distinctly alleged. True, it is said these officers undertook in good faith to carry out said contract, but their authority was denied; and it was denied that their action was at any time or in any manner ratified or approved by the corporation; and these facts are fully established by the evidence. Besides, the answer of defendants, signed by counsel, which we must assume was made with corporate authority, was of itself prompt repudiation of the contract and deed. Where an attorney institutes a suit or appears in defense of a suit brought against his client, being an officer of the court, he is presumed to have authority, and that what he does is on behalf of his client with authority duly given. Low v. Settle, 22 W. Va. 387; Fisher v. March, 26 Grat. (Va.) 765; Marling v. Robrecht, 18 W. Va. 440; McGinnis v. Curry, 13 W. Va. 29; County Court v. Duty, 77 W. Va. 17, 87 S. E. 256; Marshall v. McDermitt, 79 W. Va. 245, 90 S. E. 830, L. R. A. 1917C, 883.

[3] On the second proposition relied on, that of a holding out of the officers and directors entering into the contract in this case, there is not a particle of evidence of such conduct as would preclude or estop the defendants. Indeed, the plaintiffs do not claim that they were induced to deal with the president and directors who undertook to sell them the Burke well by any previous conduct on the part of the corporation. On the contrary the record shows that one of the plaintiffs, A. C. Lawrence, since the institution of this suit visited Montgomery, where the offices of the company are located, in search of evidence of such holding out to others, and found none, at least none which they were induced to offer in support of their present contention. They also appeal to the minutes of the directors and stockholders. These appear to have been very irregularly kept prior to the year 1915; after that time all important business of the company seems to have been transacted by the board of directors; and certainly the minutes do not show any recognition of authority of individual officers or directors to sell or dispose of the corporate property without authority of directors or stockholders. A particular instance relied on is that of a contract with the Virginian Power Company for a large quantity of gas; but the company was engaged in supplying the public with gas, and the right to make sale thereof by the managing officers might be implied; but the fact is that there was a minute of authority of the officers to sell the surplus gas sold to the power company, but not to that company, the officers electing to do so, however, because of the better price thus obtained. Because of the ratification of this contract, however, not known to plaintiffs, it can not be said that they were misled thereby, nor will one ratification of an unauthorized act conclude the principal from repudiating another. Our decisions say that authority of the president or other officer to transact the ordinary business of the corporation will not impose liability on the corporation for extraordinary contracts made by them, involving expenditure of large sums of money for supplies or machinery, or the disposition of its plant or property, not implied by the nature of the business. Varney & Evans v. Hutchinson Lumber & Manufacturing Co., 70 W. Va. 169, 73 S. E. 321. And to be binding as a ratification of the unauthorized act of an officer or other agent of a corporation, the board of directors must not have been ignorant of the facts in relation thereto. Flanagan v. Flanagan Coal Co., 77 W. Va. 757, 88 S. E. 397.

[4] It is a cardinal rule of the law of estoppel by conduct or holding out, applicable alike to corporations and individuals, that the one seeking to enforce the estoppel must have been misled by such conduct or action to his injury, else he can not rely thereon. Koontz v. Mylius, 77 W. Va. 499, 87 S. E. 851; 16 Cyc. Law & Proc. 744, 745, 748.

For the foregoing reasons we are of opinion to reverse the decree below, and to remand the cause with directions to restore the property now in the hands of the special receiver to the Columbian Carbon Company, to discharge the special receiver, settle his accounts, and upon such settlement to distribute the money in his hands to the persons entitled thereto; and the appellants will recover of A. C. Lawrence and W. A. Kennedy, appellees, the costs incurred by them upon this appeal, as well as those incurred by them in the circuit court in their defense therein.

STATE v. McKINNEY. (No. 4131.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 12, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law §386—Evidence of trailing of accused by bloodhounds held admissible.

Evidence of the trailing of a person accused of the commission of an offense, from the place of the perpetration thereof to the place of his arrest, by bloodhounds shown to be of pure blood, to have acuteness of scent and power of discrimination between persons by means thereof, to have been trained in the trailing of human beings, and to have successfully trailed and identified other persons accused of crime as having been at the scene of commission thereof, is admissible on an issue as to his identity as a person who had been at the place of the perpetration of the offense of which he is accused at or near the time thereof.

2. Criminal law §386—Admissibility of trailing of accused by bloodhounds held not precluded by issue of whether accused traveled on foot or horseback.

Admissibility thereof is not precluded by another issue as to whether the accused traveled on horseback or afoot, there being evidence tending to prove each hypothesis, nor by a preponderance of evidence, if any, in favor of the former.

3. Criminal law §383—If evidence tends to prove facts relevant to any issue it is admissible.

Upon an inquiry as to the admissibility of evidence, its weight or probative value is not the criterion or test. If it tends, even slightly, to prove a fact relevant to any issue in the case and material or forceful in the determination thereof, it is admissible.

4. Criminal law §364(6), 413(1)—Admission by accused of commission of offense some hours later, stating motive therefor, held inadmissible as self-serving and not part of res gestæ.

A statement of one accused of an offense, made some hours after the act in question, admitting it and stating the motive for commission thereof, is inadmissible; it being no part of the res gestæ and being a self-serving declaration.

5. Criminal law §368(2)—Evidence that the person shot had driven his wife from home, and that she came to the home of accused, held improperly excluded.

Upon the trial of a person charged with having maliciously shot the husband of his sister, in which there is evidence tending to prove facts which might be deemed by the jury to amount to provocation generating heat of blood, or to justification of the shooting on the ground of self-defense, it is improper and prejudicial to exclude evidence tending to prove that the wife, on coming to the home of the accused, shortly before the shooting, was in a bruised and lacerated condition and had said her husband had beaten her and driven her from home, offered in connection with evidence that the accused had gone to the home of the victim, at the request of the wife, on a humane and proper mission, in the attempt to perform which the shooting occurred.

6. Criminal law §814(2)—Slight evidence sufficient to justify instructions submitting hypotheses it tends to prove.

Slight evidence is sufficient to justify the giving of instructions submitting the hypotheses it tends to prove.

7. Criminal law §798(1)—Instruction as to reasonable doubt of any juror should be given.

An instruction on the subject of the legal requirement of unanimity of the jury in the finding of a verdict, which, if given, would advise the jury that, if any juror, after due consideration of the evidence and consultation with his fellows, has reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused in a criminal case, it is his duty not to surrender his own convictions simply because the other jurors are of a different opinion, is correct, and should be given upon request, unless its subject is covered by some other instruction given in the case.

Error to Circuit Court, Summers County.

London McKinney was convicted of malicious shooting, and he brings error. Reversed and remanded.

T. N. Read and R. F. Dunlap, both of Hinton, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., and R. A. Blessing, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

POFFENBARGER, J. Having been convicted of the malicious shooting of J. G. McKinney, the plaintiff in error, London McKinney, complains of the judgment entered on the verdict, which imposes upon him imprisonment in the penitentiary of this state for the period of six years.

An assignment of error is based upon the overruling of a motion to quash the indictment, but nothing is said in argument in support thereof. The indictment is in the usual form, and no defect therein is perceived.

A statement of the peculiar facts of the case is necessary to a clear comprehension of the other rulings complained of. While on his porch, early in a November evening, but after dark, J. G. McKinney was shot in the face; the ball striking the right cheek, knocking out some teeth, breaking the jawbone, and, divided into parts, lodging in various places in the neck and head. The shot came from the neighborhood of his gate, and, at the time, his dogs were at that point apparently resisting entrance, and he had hissed them on and may possibly have thrown a stick, which, the accused says, struck him before he fired the shot. J. G. McKinney says he hissed the dogs under the impression that the attempted intruder into the yard was an old sow of his, that had been in the habit of breaking in. He saw nobody at the gate and the identity of the person who did the shooting was not discovered until later. At the time of the injury he was alone on his porch, but his children, five or six in number, were in the house. The age of the oldest of them was about 14 years. After the injury he called them and they managed to get him in the house. Neighbors and officers, being notified, came in to render assistance. The aid of a man having two young bloodhounds was secured. The bloodhounds were taken to the point from which the shot seemed to have come, and there they took up the trail and followed it for a distance of about eight miles, to the home of Luke McKinney, the father of the accused. In their pursuit of the trail, the dogs were accompanied by several persons, among whom were two deputy sheriffs, two constables, a justice of the peace, and the owner of the dogs. Having led the crowd to the front door of the home of Luke McKinney, the dogs were taken behind the house and kept there until London McKinney was aroused and taken from his bed and to a point 75 or 100 yards from the house. Then they were again put upon his trail, and went to him and gave manifestations of their identity of him as the person they had been trailing. Thereupon he admitted he had been at the house of J. G. McKinney on the previous evening, at about 7 o'clock or 7:30, and also that he had fired the shot. After this confession he was placed under arrest, and subsequently repeated the admissions. On the trial he testified in his own favor, and there admitted that he had done the shooting with a 22-caliber Winchester rifle having a magazine capacity of 16 cartridges, which he had carried from his home and back to it.

There is conflict in the evidence as to what preceded the tragedy, led up to it, and may have entered into the purposes and mental attitude of the accused. Before noon of the day of the shooting, the wife of J. G. McKinney, who was also the sister of the accused, came to the home of Luke McKinney and remained there until after the shooting. She and her husband both claim she went there merely to visit her father and others of the family. The accused offered to prove she had come to her father's house with bruises on her face, loosened teeth, a severe laceration of the knee, and other injuries, and stated that her husband had beaten her and driven her from home. He was not permitted to prove her physical condition at that time. The court, however, permitted him to prove she had said her husband had accused her of things she was not guilty of, and had told her to go to her father's home and stay a few days, until they could get things fixed up; that she had told them of some little troubles she and her husband had had; that she had then asked her father to go and see her husband and endeavor to obtain his consent to her return and effect a reconciliation; that he had refused to do so; and that she had then requested her brother, the accused, to do so, and also to see if her husband was there, and, if not, to take care of the children for the night. He was also permitted to prove the communication by the wife, on that occasion, of threats made by her husband against her and all of her family. The threats were to the effect that he had expressed an inclination to go down there and call them all out and shoot them down, one at a time, and that he intended to send her home and get them all together and kill them by blowing up the house with dynamite.

On the witness stand the wife denied communication of such threats, the making thereof, and any trouble between herself and her husband. She also denied having requested either her father or her brother to go to her house that night, and knowledge of his having gone there. She admitted she knew he had left the house in the evening, but denied that she knew where he had gone. Although the father and unmarried sister say they knew he had been requested to go, they denied knowledge of his having gone. He himself said he did not promise to go when requested, but had afterwards concluded to do so, and had gone without giving notice of his intention so to do.

He says he made the trip both ways on horseback, and, having hitched his horse at the road, started to the house. Just before he reached the gate, which stood about 15 or 20 feet from the porch, the dogs became aroused and endeavored to break through. Knowing they were vicious, he kept his eye on them, and just as he was about to place his hand on the gate a stick of wood thrown from the porch struck the gate and himself, making a slight bruise below one of his eyes. He further says that, after having recovered slightly from the blow thus received, he saw J. G. McKinney, by means of the light from a window, stoop as if he were picking up something and partially rise with a gun in his hands, as he thought. Thereupon he fired the shot. Not knowing the result thereof and fearing to venture into the unknown situation, he walked back to the road, mounted his horse and returned home, arriving there about nine o'clock. The father and sister were apprised of the shooting before his return, and the former says he had left home for the purpose of obtaining information about it and rendering assistance, and met the son on the road, as he was returning, but he was not then informed that he had done the shooting.

[1] Although the accused and other witnesses swore he had ridden a certain horse on the night of the tragedy, witnesses for the state say they discovered no horse tracks at the point at which he says he hitched the horse, and also that the hounds, in their trailing, seemed to follow the tracks of a man, and not those of a horse. Under these circumstances, whether the accused made the trip on horseback or on foot was a question for jury determination. In view of this conflict, it was not improper to admit the evidence of the trailing of the accused by the bloodhounds, if it was sufficiently shown that they were such hounds, that they had acuteness of scent, and power of discrimination between persons, and had been trained to trail human beings. Pedigo v. Commonwealth, 103 Ky. 41, 44 S. W. 143, 42 L. R. A. 432, 82 Am. St. Rep. 566; Hodge v. State, 98 Ala. 10, 13 South. 385, 39 Am. St. Rep. 17; Simpson v. State, 111 Ala. 6, 20 South. 573; 1 Wigmore, Evidence, § 177, p. 226. The owner of the dogs testified that they were of pure blood, that they had acuteness of human beings, and, that, on more than one occasion, they had successfully trailed and identified persons accused of crime.

[2] Less definiteness and positiveness in the evidence for the state, as to how the accused traveled, than in that adduced by him, does not render the bloodhound evidence inadmissible. It suffices that there is some evidence of his having traveled on foot. Nor does his evidence as to the time of his return bar it. Whether he and his witnesses stated it correctly was a question for the jury. He may have been able to walk or run the distance stated in about two hours. If not, the evidence that he traveled afoot tends to prove he did return by 9 o'clock.

[3] In this ruling we are not dealing with the probative value of such evidence. Whether it alone would be sufficient for identification of the accused as a person who had been at the scene of the shooting immediately before is an entirely different question. In view of the admission of the accused, it cannot arise here. On a question of mere admissibility of evidence, its tendency to prove a relevant and material fact, not its weight or value, is the sole inquiry.

Mrs. J. G. McKinney's denial of communication of threats of her husband against her and her family to John Cyrus and Mrs. Ruth Taylor was not excluded. It was at first, probably on account of the form of the question, but it was immediately afterwards admitted, and Cyrus and Mrs. Taylor were permitted to contradict her.

[4] The offer to prove the accused had confessed the shooting to his sister on his return was properly rejected. Having been made hours after the shooting, the confession was no part of the res gestæ. Besides, it was a mere self-serving declaration.

[5] Refusal to admit evidence tending to prove the physical condition of Mrs. J. G. McKinney on her arrival at the home of her parents, indicating cruel and abusive treatment, and her statement that it had just been inflicted by her husband, was erroneous. Such condition, if it existed, and the declaration, if made, were facts and circumstances constituting in part, according to the theory of the defense, inducement to the admitted conduct of the accused, including the act on his part, of which the state complains. All such facts, whether probative of guilt or innocence, are part and parcel of the transaction, and, if they have any probative value at all, in either direction, they are admissible. State v. Prater, 52 W. Va. 132, 43 S. E. 230; St. Clair v. United States, 154 U. S. 134, 14 Sup. Ct. 1002, 38 L. Ed. 936; Whar. Ev. § 259.

Taken in connection with the relationship of the parties, including previous unbroken friendship between the accused and his victim, these circumstances have important bearing upon the mental attitude and intent of the former. They enter into the motive with which he made the trip to the home of the latter and his estimate of the situation in which he suddenly found himself at the time of the shooting. The immediately preceding violence of J. G. McKinney toward his wife, and his banishment of her from his home, if proved, make out an entirely different case from that which was presented to the jury. He went on a mission to a man who had partially executed his threat upon one member of the family, not a man who had merely made a possibly idle threat. He went to intercede for a badly abused sister and to protect her young children, if he should find them deserted, not to a husband and father who had merely had a few unpleasant words with his wife and ordered her to leave home. If he went upon such a mission, under such circumstances, the fact that he went armed takes upon itself a character and coloring it would not have in the case of a visit to a quarrelsome, but harmless, man, for such a purpose. The previous anger, inhumanity, and enmity, if any, taken in connection with the suddenness and violence of the assault, as described by the accused, may have been a considerable factor in his determination of the question of imminent danger to himself and the necessity of resort to measures of protection.

Again, the shot may have been the result of an impulse suddenly aroused by the hissing of the dogs and the blow, in a mind perfectly free from malice and engaged in the execution of a manifestly humane and proper purpose, having a broader and deeper basis in the violence inflicted upon the sister than it could otherwise have had. Whether the accused, if guilty of an offense, fired the shot maliciously or merely in heat of blood, arising upon sufficient provocation, is a very important inquiry in the case, since the punishment of the two offenses are radically different, and his motive, determinable in part by the information in the light of which he acted, has obvious and important bearing upon it. His visit with a good purpose would be very different from one made with an evil purpose, and the purpose, whatever it was, constituted an element of his mental attitude at the moment of the assault upon him, whether intended or not, and his defensive or retaliatory act. For these reasons, the ruling in question was both erroneous and prejudicial.

[8] That the accused was struck with a stick of wood or other missile thrown by his victim is not uncontroverted. Evidence was adduced of an admission on his part that the bruise below his eye was caused by an accident in the cutting of firewood, not an unusual occurrence with persons cutting stove wood and kindling. Hence the state's instruction No. 4, submitting, among others, the issue as to provocation for the shooting, did not improperly require a finding as to its existence. For the same reason, the court did not err in the giving of the state's instruction No. 6, submitting, among others, an inquiry as to whether there was an overt act on the part of J. G. McKinney, indicative of hostile and dangerous intent and purpose toward the accused. He neither denied nor admitted the throwing of a stick, but the court was not bound to assume the truth of the evidence of the accused as to that issue. However it might be in the absence of contradiction of such testimony, the contradiction thereof found in the evidence of his inconsistent admission made the issue one for jury determination.

Instruction No. 11 requested by the defendant was properly refused. If given, it would have told the jury there could be no conviction, if they believed the shooting occurred in an affray and malice did not exist in the mind of the accused at the beginning of the affray. In this it manifestly deviates from the law. Malice may arise in the course of an affray. State v. Taylor, 57 W. Va. 228, 50 S. E. 247.

[7] No good reason is perceived for refusal of instruction No. 4 requested by the defendant, unless it falls within the scope of some other instruction given. Its subject-matter was the legal requirement of unanimity of the jury in the finding of the verdict, and it would have advised them that, if any juror, after due consideration of the evidence and consultation with his fellow jurors, should entertain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused, it was his duty not to surrender his own convictions simply because the others were of a different opinion. No misleading element is found in it, and it does not import justification or encouragement of obduracy or arbitrariness on the part of an individual juror. A majority of the court are of the opinion, however, that the subject is sufficiently covered by instruction No. 2 given for the accused. I do not think so, because the primary subject of that instruction was presumption of innocence, and the requirement of unanimity in the verdict is a subordinate, if not an incidental, subject or element thereof.

For the erroneous exclusion of evidence herein noted, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

(83 W. Va. 336)

JONES v. HEBDO. (No. 4154.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 12, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \S 971(1)—Court's discretion as to examination of witnesses will not be reversed except for abuse.

A trial court has wide latitude in the conduct of a trial, and particularly in matters pertaining to the examination of witnesses, and its rulings in relation thereto will not be reversed except when there has been a plain abuse of its discretion.

2. Trial \S 68(1)—Refusal to admit evidence after conclusion of introduction of evidence to admit contradictory or cumulative testimony not an abuse of discretion.

And when the evidence in chief and in rebuttal have been concluded on both sides and the case is about to be submitted to the jury, the refusal of the court to open up the evidence to admit the testimony of other witnesses known but not summoned and whose evidence is but contradictory or cumulative of some other evidence will not ordinarily constitute abuse of the court's discretion or reversible error.

3. False imprisonment \S 36—$2,725 not excessive damages.

Where in an action for damages for assault and unlawful arrest and imprisonment the evidence shows that defendant falsely and without any grounds whatsoever swore out a warrant charging plaintiff with a heinous crime, and while in transit from this state to a distant state accompanied by her daughter causes her to be arrested in the nighttime, taken from the train on which she is traveling and conducted through the public streets of a city and before a magistrate and delayed from four to six hours, and then to be discharged by the magistrate without offering any evidence of the truth or falsity of his accusation, and her journey is thereby broken and she is greatly disturbed in mind and body, a verdict of $2,725.00 will not be set aside as excessive and unwarranted by the evidence.

4. False imprisonment \S 34, 35—Mental suffering ground for compensatory and punitive damages.

In such case mental pain and suffering and the insult, indignity and humiliation inflicted upon plaintiff by the wrongful and unlawful act of the defendant constitute just bases for compensatory damages, to which, if the jury believe from the evidence the sum found therefor is not sufficient to punish the defendant for his wrongful and unlawful conduct, the jury in their discretion may add such additional sum as will constitute sufficient punishment therefor.

Error to Circuit Court, Wood County.

Action by Mary E. Jones against Simon Hebdo. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Chas. J. Schuck, of Wheeling, and R. E. Bills and O. M. Hanna, both of Parkersburg, for plaintiff in error.

Fred L. Shinn, of Clarksburg, and James S. Wade, of Parkersburg, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. In an action by plaintiff against defendant for assault, false arrest and imprisonment, and for damages sustained because of the alleged injuries, she obtained a verdict and judgment for $2,725.00, which judgment defendant would have us reverse on the present writ of error.

The declaration is in two counts. The first charges that the defendant with force and arms, on July 6, 1918, in the city of Parkersburg, in Wood County, assaulted plaintiff, and then and there wrongfully seized and laid hold of her, and then and there wrongfully and against her will forced her to go from and out of a railway train of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, then standing at the Sixth Street station in said city, and upon which she was then and there lawfully being conveyed as a passenger from the city of Clarksburg in said state to the city of St. Louis in the state of Missouri, to a certain police station in said city of Parkersburg, and then and there in said police station wrongfully imprisoned her by force and against her will, without any reasonable or probable cause therefor, for the space of about four hours, and there wrongfully forced and compelled her to go from said police station to and along divers public streets in said city of Parkersburg to the office of a certain justice of the peace therein situated, and then and there wrongfully kept and detained her by force and against her will, without any reasonable or probable cause, for the space of two hours then following, where she was discharged from custody by said justice upon the motion of defendant without any trial being had, contrary to the law of the State of West Virginia, and whereby she was not only greatly hurt, mortified and outraged, but also greatly injured in her credit, standing and good name, and suffered greatly therefrom in both body and mind, to her damage $10,000.00.

By the second count it is charged that while so in said train lawfully as alleged in the first count and en route from said city of Clarksburg to the town of Eldorado, Kansas, about the hour of 3:30 a. m. of the said day, defendant and divers other persons to plaintiff unknown, but who were then and there under the direction and control of defendant, entered the coach of said train in which she was so riding as a passenger, and with force and arms, without any probable cause therefor, and without any right or authority of law therefor, and without any justification or excuse therefor, and against her will and in utter disregard of and in violation of her constitutional right of personal liberty, unlawfully and maliciously did arrest her and by force remove her from said coach against her will, and detained and imprisoned her, and did unlawfully and maliciously and without probable cause or right or authority of law cause her to be imprisoned and detained against her will in said police station for the period of four hours, and therefore and as alleged in the first count, caused her to go along the public streets of said city of Parkersburg in the custody of divers persons, then under the control and direction and orders of defendant, to the office of a certain justice of the peace located in said city of Parkersburg, who did then and there further detain her against her will unlawfully and maliciously and without right or authority of law for a long space of time, to-wit, for the space of two hours, when she was discharged from the custody of said justice, on motion of defendant by his attorney, without any trial being had, by reason of which she was detained and imprisoned and was greatly humiliated and embarrassed, and was greatly injured in her good name, fame, credit and reputation, and by reason of which she was detained in her journey to join her husband, and was compelled to remain over in the city of Parkersburg until she could arrange for her transportation on a later train, and by reason of which delay she was required to pay and did pay out large sums of money for her board and for railroad transportation, and divers other sums for counsel fees and court expenses and other charges growing out of her arrest, detention and unlawful imprisonment, and was otherwise greatly injured and damaged, in the sum of $10,000.00.

On the trial, on the issue joined on the plea of not guilty, the jury found on evidence which justified them in so finding, that plaintiff was arrested and taken off the train on a warrant sworn out by the defendant before said justice charging her with the offense of being then engaged in transporting out of this state to the state of Missouri her daughter, then a girl of about seventeen years of age, and who had recently become the wife of one James Joseph, a nephew of the defendant, for the purpose of prostitution or other immoral purposes; that said charge was false and unfounded; that defendant was present at the time and delivered the warrant to a policeman, one Yoho, and directed him to go upon the train and serve the warrant, which called for the arrest of the plaintiff and her daughter, and to take them off the train; that Hebdo accompanied the policeman and the prisoners to the police station, where both were turned over to the desk clerk, one O'Neal; and that plaintiff was left in the police station and her daughter taken by Yoho the policeman and delivered to the jail-or of the county, and the daughter detained there until the next morning, when she and her mother, the latter having demanded a trial, were taken before the justice, and the plaintiff discharged without trial, on the motion of Hebdo or his attorney; that the swearing out of the warrant falsely accusing plaintiff of a grave offense was a scheme or plan of defendant or his advisors to aid his nephew Joseph to capture plaintiff's daughter, who had foolishly married him a short time before, and who soon afterwards went with him to Wheeling, where he practically abandoned her, going into the army and making no provisions for her, but left her to shift for herself, and she finally was obliged to return to her father and mother.

Some effort was made on the trial to disconnect defendant with the warrant, and he and his nephew swear that he was not present at the justice's office or at the train where the warrant was executed, and that the nephew, not Hebdo, obtained the warrant. But the transcript of the justice and the testimony of the officer who made the arrest, as well as the evidence of plaintiff and her daughter and others, show clearly that both were at least mistaken. The policeman who executed the warrant swears that Hebdo gave him the warrant at the train and directed him what to do with it; that he followed Hebdo's instruction and arrested both plaintiff and her daughter; that after getting them both off the train Hebdo may have said to plaintiff she might go on, as the train started; but that the warrant called for both, and he said she could not go, and they took both to the police station and there turned them over to the desk clerk, and afterwards took the daughter to the jail and delivered her to the turnkey.

We have recited so much of the pleadings and evidence to show the application of the points of error relied on. The first is that the court erred in refusing to allow defendant to examine as a witness O. E. Boice after the parties had introduced their evidence in chief and in rebuttal, but before the jury had retired, the court ruling it out on the ground that the offer came too late and after the evidence in the case had been closed on both sides. According to the proffer then made defendant proposed to prove by the witness that Boice was with Yoho at the time that Mrs. Jones and her daughter Mrs. Joseph left the train at Parkersburg, and that both left the train of their own accord, neither being arrested, and that when Mrs. Joseph found her husband at the station platform she left the train and her mother followed her, and that Mrs. Jones was never placed under arrest. The bill of exceptions shows that defendant had never had this witness summoned, although it recites he had been duly summoned, it is likely meant that he had been summoned by the other party.

Two grounds are relied on by plaintiff's counsel to sustain the ruling of the court: First, the lack of diligence on the part of defendant in procuring the presence of the witness before the close of the evidence; second, that the evidence of the witness as proffered was merely cumulative of other evidence on the same subject.

[1, 2] That defendant was wanting in proper effort to obtain the witness seems manifest. He must have known that Boice was present at the time of the alleged arrest, and it was his duty to look him up and obtain his presence. Our decisions say that the court has wide latitude in matters pertaining to the examination of witnesses, and the rulings of the trial court will not be reversed unless there has been a plain violation of its discretion. Tully v. Despard, 31 W. Va. 370, 6 S. E. 927, where the rule was applied in a case where counsel had omitted to request certain instructions after the jury had been directed to retire. Dowler v. Gas Co., 71 W. Va. 417, 76 S. E. 845, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 341, where the rule was applied on the recalling of a witness to give further evidence. Burns et al. v. Morrison, 36 W. Va. 423, 15 S. E. 62, where the rule of wide discretion in the trial court was applied without reversible error in allowing the withdrawal of a joinder in the demurrer to the evidence. The record does not here present a case of an omission to produce evidence under a misapprehension of law calling for the opening of the case and receipt of additional or other evidence such as was presented in Cook v. Raleigh Lumber Co., 74 W. Va. 603, 82 S. E. 327, cited and relied on by defendant's counsel. The case here is one of pure neglect to produce a witness in time to give evidence on facts testified to by other witnesses on a vital issue in the case, of which defendant must be presumed to have had knowledge. And citing the cases already referred to, we said in Daniels v. Thacker Fuel Co., 79 W. Va. 255, 90 S. E. 840, applying the same rule, that in matters pertaining to the conduct of the trial, including joinder and withdrawal of demurrers to evidence, we will not reverse such discretionary action unless the same has been exercised in a manner plainly arbitrary or otherwise obviously improper. In Webb v. Ritter, 60 W. Va. 193, 54 S. E. 483, we held, in accordance with the cases cited, that we would not disturb a verdict and judgment because of the refusal of the trial court to admit evidence offered after the conclusion of the introduction of evidence of both plaintiff and defendant, unless it appears that the trial court in so doing abuses its discretionary powers by refusing to allow the act in the furtherance of justice. In the case at bar, where the warrant for the arrest of the plaintiff and her daughter was sworn out by the defendant and placed in the hands of the officer, and the officer swears he executed the same by arresting the parties accused, and they are both taken before the officer issuing the warrant and dismissed in the manner admitted and shown in the record, the evidence of Boice, if he had been allowed to testify as proposed, could have had little if any weight with the jury. Moreover, the ruling of the court was proper because the proposed evidence was merely contradictory or cumulative of other evidence already before the jury. It introduced no new facts. Defendant undertook to prove by his witnesses Joseph Hebdo, James Joseph, Samuel Plaine and P. E. Gaynor that Mrs. Jones was at no time under arrest, that both she and her daughter voluntarily got off the train, and that Mrs. Jones was told that she was not under arrest etc. The jury did not believe these witnesses. It may be that after getting plaintiff off the train by means of the warrant of arrest and arresting her as the officer says he did, defendant and his co-workers would have been glad to get rid of her; but that is not material, and the jury were not convinced that she was not arrested as she and the other witnesses say she was. We can not see that the court abused the discretion which it was entitled to exercise on the trial and that its ruling on the proposed evidence of Boice was erroneous.

The next ground of error is that the court should have sustained defendant's motion for a new trial: (a) Because the verdict was contrary to the evidence; (b) because it was excessive; and (c) because of the refusal of the court to admit the evidence of the witness Boice, the question just disposed of.

That defendant was unlawfully arrested there can be no doubt. The evidence on the question is overwhelmingly in plaintiff's favor. Indeed there was no attempt to justify her arrest; the only attempt was to evade the fact of her arrest at the instance and on the motion of defendant. The jury has settled that question of fact against him.

[3] The principal point of attack is upon the alleged excessiveness of the verdict. It is contended that as plaintiff offered no evidence of the amount of expenses incurred or money paid out for board, railroad transportation, counsel fees, court costs, etc., nor of damages sustained by the delay, the damages awarded by the jury must be regarded as mainly punitive or vindictive, in an amount not justified by the evidence, and so evidencing partiality and prejudice against the defendant on account of nationality or some other cause not justified in law. But plaintiff was necessarily outraged and distressed in body and mind by the false charges and the manner in which she was arrested. The purpose of capturing her daughter was no justification for the outrage committed upon her.

[4] What elements are proper to be considered in estimating compensatory damages as distinguished from punitive or vindictive damages in such cases? According to our holdings compensatory damages include allowance for mental anguish and pain and suffering in addition to mere pecuniary loss when accompanied by injury from assault, indignity or injury to reputation etc. Davis v. Telegraph Co., 46 W. Va. 48, 53, 32 S. E. 1026; Johnson v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 82 W. Va. 692, 97 S. E. 189, 6 A. L. R. 1469; Hess v. Marinari, 81 W. Va. 500, 503, 94 S. E. 963. Here the jury were not required by any instruction or otherwise to separate the compensatory from the vindictive or punitive damages, if any, included in their verdict, as was the case in Pendleton v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 82 W. Va. 270, 95 S. E. 941. So that we have to determine whether the evidence justifies the amount of the verdict on the theory of compensatory and punitive damages which may have been found by the jury. In cases like this damages assessed for mental pain and suffering, for insult, indignity and humiliation inflicted, resulting from the wrongful and unlawful act of the defendant, constitute the bases for compensatory damages, and if these in the judgment of the jury be not sufficient for adequate punishment, the jury are then allowed to add a sufficient sum properly proportionate to the actual or compensatory damages as in their judgment will constitute sufficient punishment to act as a deterrent to wrongdoers. The amount of such damages being in their nature indeterminate, are peculiarly within the province of the jury, and their verdict will not ordinarily be disturbed unless so small or so gross as to evidence partiality, prejudice or misconduct. Burdette v. Goldenburg, 104 S. E. 270; Gibbard v. Evans, 106 S. E. 37.

The amount of the verdict in this case no doubt seems large, but can it properly be set aside under the rules of practice obtaining in this state? Defendant made groundless charges against plaintiff, caused her to be arrested thereon and to be taken in the nighttime from a railway train to a police station, her journey broken, and to be detained unlawfully. This was a wilful and wanton act on his part, and in total disregard of her lawful rights. For all of this she was entitled to adequate compensation, and if this was not sufficient to adequately punish him, to such additional damages as will furnish such punishment. Pendleton v. N. & W. Ry. Co., supra, 82 W. Va. 270, 276, 95 S. E. 941.

On the question of the amount of the verdict defendant cites and relies on Ogg v. Murdock, 25 W. Va. 139, a case involving an attachment in a civil suit for debt, the court holding that defendant was justified in believing plaintiff was about to leave the state without paying his debt, but was mistaken, no malice or intentional wrong being intended. There a verdict of $475.00 was set aside for the reason indicated. In the case of Johnson v. Railway Co., supra, a verdict of $1000.00 was sustained where there was controversy whether the plaintiff was in fact arrested or detained, and where no indignity or humiliation of consequence was inflicted upon her.

She was accused by the agent of the railway company of having in her possession in a suit case shipped as baggage intoxicating liquors. In Turk v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 75 W. Va. 623, 84 S. E. 569, L. R. A. 1915E, 145, we sustained a judgment on a verdict in a similar case for $500.00 compensatory damages and $1,000.00 punitive damages. In this case the evidence warrants the conclusion that defendant's action was wanton and wilful, if not malicious. In 11 R. C. L. 821, § 36, it is said:

"If the wrong was done maliciously or wantonly, vindictive damages are recoverable, and as to these the extent of the jury's discretion is even wider than in the case of compensatory damages. Malice, as used in this connection, does not necessarily mean anger, or a malevolent or vindictive feeling toward plaintiff; but a wrongful act without reasonable excuse is malicious within the legal meaning of the term."

No doubt the jury in this case, as expressed by their verdict, were influenced by the utter want of justification for the arrest and detention of plaintiff. One of the officers required to make the arrest said, that when asked what the plaintiff had done Hebdo said, "Nothing." The financial circumstances of defendant are not shown, and it does not clearly appear just what amount would be necessary to properly punish him for his wrong. It does appear that he was a merchant of some sort in Parkersburg, probably engaged in the business of confectioner and fruit dealer. But following the rules governing in cases of this kind, we are not disposed to reverse the judgment on account of the magnitude of the verdict. It will therefore be affirmed.

DE LAY et al. v. LATIMER. (No. 2170.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Dismissal and nonsuit §24—Plaintiff may discontinue foreclosure suit as to defendant not asking affirmative relief.

The plaintiff may, as a matter of right strike the name of one of several defendants, where such defendant prays for no relief against the plaintiff, or any codefendant.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Suit by W. Carroll Latimer against L. V. De Lay and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed. See, also, 106 S. E. 903.

W. Carroll Latimer, as assignee of a mortgage on realty dated in 1899, sought to foreclose it in equity against the mortgagor, J.

M. De Lay, a nonresident of the state, making the latter's wife, L. V. De Lay, codefendant. The petition alleged, among other matters, that the wife, subsequently to the execution of the mortgage and the creation of the debt it was given to secure, had the realty set apart to her and the minor children of herself and husband as a homestead out of his estate; that there was a waiver of homestead in the notes secured by the mortgage, which were of even date with it; that the minors are of age, the wife occupies the dwelling on the mortgaged premises, which is in a dilapidated condition, and she is unable to make any repairs; and that the property is deteriorating in value. The prayers are for judgment against the defendants for the debt, with interest; that the mortgage be declared a lien upon the premises for the principal and interest of the debt as set out; that the mortgage be foreclosed, the equity of redemption barred, and the land be sold to pay the debt; and that process issue against the defendants. Under the order of court, service was perfected by publication upon the nonresident mortgagor.

Mrs. De Lay demurred to the petition, on the grounds: (1) It sets out no cause of action against her. (2) There is no equity in it. (3) There is an adequate remedy at law. (4) On special grounds to several paragraphs. The special grounds of demurrer were met by amendment, grounds 1, 2, and 3 were overruled, and the demurrant filed exceptions pendente lite to this ruling, and assigned error thereon in a bill of exceptions. Mrs. De Lay in her original answer avers that the mortgaged property was purchased with her money; title thereto taken in the name of her husband without her knowledge or consent, and mortgaged without her knowledge or consent; that upon learning these facts as to the deed and mortgage, being advised by counsel that she could obtain a homestead in the property, which would take precedence over the mortgage, and being apprehensive that, if she should seek to assert her perfect equity in the property, her husband would be prosecuted criminally, she applied for a homestead, and had it set apart in the mortgaged premises as the property of her husband.

"And she alleges that on account of the position of duress in which she was placed, and the bona fide mistake about her rights under the homestead, she ought not now to be precluded from setting up her equity in the land."

Further, she alleges she took the homestead to prevent the property from being sold under foreclosure of the mortgage, this purpose being known to the mortgagee, who was duly notified of her application for homestead and made no objection. She took possession of the homestead property with the understanding that her homestead was superior to the mortgage, which claim of hers was known to the mortgagee, and she has been in the peaceable, continuous, and adverse possession of the property for more than seven years, and therefore says that the lien of the mortgage cannot now be asserted as against her right. Furthermore she avers that petitioner and those under whom he claims have been guilty of laches, by acquiescence for so long a time in the enjoyment by the defendant of her homestead rights, and they have thereby waived their claim of priority by reason of the alleged waiver of homestead in the notes secured by the mortgage, and ought not now to be allowed to assert the lien of the mortgage.

At the trial term the wife amended her answer by setting up usury in the notes secured by the mortgage, and averring that therefore the waivers of homestead in the notes and mortgage are void, and that the mortgage cannot prevail against the homestead rights of the defendant. After the allowance of the amendment, petitioner moved to strike the wife's name as a party defendant, and to dismiss the case as to her. This motion was sustained by the court, over objection of the wife:

"That she had the right to have a trial and an adjudication of the court upon the issues made by her pleadings, so as to determine whether the plaintiff's mortgage was superior to her homestead, or whether, by reason of the facts alleged in her pleading, her homestead was superior to the plaintiff's mortgage."

On the order dismissing her from the case she assigned error in a bill of exceptions, on the grounds that the mortgagor was not served personally, but by publication; that he entered no appearance, made no defense to the suit, and therefore—

"the case was a contest in rem between the alleged holder of the mortgage, who was the plaintiff, and the claimant of the homestead, to wit, the defendant. * * * Wherefore the court could not, on a mere request or motion of the plaintiff, without any legal reason therefor, and over the objection of the defendant, * * * dismiss her as a party to the suit."

The trial proceeded against the mortgagor alone, and resulted in a verdict of foreclosure of the mortgage for the principal and interest due on the note, and barring the equity of redemption.

A. H. Davis, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

Albert E. Mayer and W. Carroll Latimer, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The Civil Code of 1910, § 5688, provides that, when two or more persons are sued in the same action either on a contract or for a tort, the plaintiff may amend his declaration by striking out one or more of such defendants, and proceed against the remaining defendant or defendants, if there is no other legal difficulty in the case. The defendant dismissed from the suit set up various grounds in her original answer and the amendment thereto why the petitioner's claim to foreclose the mortgage should be denied, but she prayed for no affirmative relief, either against the plaintiff or her codefendant, and therefore no legal difficulty is presented why the petitioner should not exercise his statutory right to discontinue the case as to her by having her name stricken as a defendant. Bower v. Cohen, 126 Ga. 35, 37, 54 S. E. 918; Pearson v. Courson, 129 Ga. 656 (5), 59 S. E. 907.

As the defendant in her answer prayed for no relief, the fact that the suit to foreclose the mortgage may in the circumstances be a proceeding in rem does not affect the ruling made.

Judgment affirmed.

DE LAY v. LATIMER. (No. 2171.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Homestead §112—Attempted conveyance by head of family without order of court does not confer reversionary interest.

Since the adoption of the Constitution of 1877, lands set apart as a homestead cannot be conveyed by the head of a family pending the homestead, except by order of court as prescribed in the statute, and an attempted sale is invalid, and does not convey the reversionary interest.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Suit by W. Carroll Latimer against J. M. De Lay and another. Judgment refusing to allow M. L. De Lay to intervene, and he brings error. Affirmed.

A. H. Davis, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Albert E. Mayer and W. Carroll Latimer, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. M. L. De Lay presented his petition to be allowed to intervene in the case of W. Carroll Latimer against J. M. De Lay and Mrs. L. V. De Lay, an equitable petition to foreclose a mortgage on realty, the facts of the case being set forth in De Lay v. Latimer, 106 S. E. 901, this day decided. The petition for intervention was based upon the allegation that J. M. De Lay, on August 24, 1918, conveyed to petitioner by warranty deed the premises which J. M. De

Lay mortgaged in 1899, and which were set apart to Mrs. L. V. De Lay, the mortgagor's wife, as a homestead in 1900. The court refused to allow the intervention, and the petitioner excepted. Held:

Since the adoption of the Constitution of 1877, land set apart as a homestead cannot be conveyed by the head of a family, pending the homestead, except by order of court, as prescribed in the statute, and an effort to sell it does not result in a conveyance of the "reversionary interest," but is simply invalid. Denson v. Keys, 140 Ga. 184, 78 S. E. 768.

As, under the facts stated, the alleged deed to the petitioner for intervention was void, the court did not err in refusing to allow him to intervene.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

LANGSTON v. STATE. (No. 2277.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law §534(1, 2), 535(2)—Uncorroborated confession will not support conviction; exhibition of money said to have been taken from person killed, does not corroborate confession; proof of death, not shown to have been due to criminal agency, does not corroborate; evidence insufficient to show criminal agency.

On the trial of an accused person charged with murder, a confession alone, uncorroborated by other evidence, will not justify a conviction.

(a) Proof that the accused exhibited money to a witness will not suffice to corroborate a confession that the accused killed the deceased for the purpose of robbery and took the money from his person, there being no other evidence tending to show that the deceased had any money about his person at the time of the alleged homicide.

(b) On such a trial, proof of the death of the person alleged to have been slain, and that his body was found at a particular place, was insufficient to corroborate a confession of the accused that he killed the deceased at the place where his body was found, for the purpose of robbery; there being no extraneous evidence sufficient to show that death was caused by any criminal agency.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Homicide §149—Death presumed due to natural causes.

On a trial for murder, the presumption is that deceased came to his death by natural causes.

Error from Superior Court, Morgan County; Jas. B. Park, Judge.

Henry Langston, Jr., was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Reversed.

Henry Langston, Jr., and John Henry Brady were charged with the murder of Henry Moody by "shooting with a rifle and striking with an axe the said Henry Moody," thereby inflicting the mortal wound. On the separate trial of Langston, it appeared that the deceased, a colored man 70 or 80 years of age, lived alone on a plantation in a hut, situated in a pine thicket about one-fourth of a mile from the house of any other person. He was last seen alive Wednesday afternoon while working for his employer. His body was found on the floor in his house Friday afternoon next ensuing. Langston was a young colored man, had lived in the neighborhood several years, and was acquainted with deceased.

Evidence was introduced as to certain confessions alleged to have been made by Langston, to the effect that on Wednesday, while he and Brady were working in a field together, they agreed "to go over there that night and kill Uncle Henry." They reached his house about 8 o'clock and found him "getting supper—scraping out the tray." Defendant took his [deceased's] army rifle off the bed and shot him in the back of the head, and Brady "hit him with the ax." They then ran out of doors, and later came back and "robbed him." Langston got $83, and gave Brady $3. When asked why they killed him, Langston said, "We wanted the money." Also a colored boy, with whom Langston had been a companion for several years, testified that "two or three days after the killing" he and the accused were walking along the road, and, without being questioned, the latter exhibited "about $85," which he had "in an old pocket handkerchief," which was counted in witness' presence; and Langston said "he had killed old man Henry Moody and took the money off of him; * * * he said it was on a Wednesday night." The same witness also testified:

"Henry Moody is dead. I have not seen him. I remember about the time" he "was killed."

The employee of Moody testified that Friday afternoon, on being informed by another employee of the discovery of Moody's body, he and others went to the house of Moody. The witness thus described the scene:

"When I got there, I didn't go in the house; when the door was opened, I saw him lying on the floor. I did not inspect the place where he was wounded; a great many of them did, though. He was dead when I saw him. * * * I went as close to the door as from here to you. I made no examination of him at all. I don't know what killed him. Of my own knowledge, I don't know how he came to his death. I believe he was killed on Wednesday night."

Williford & Lambert, of Madison, for plaintiff in error.

Doyle Campbell, Sol. Gen., and A. Y. Clement, both of Monticello, R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., and Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

ATKINSON, J. It is declared in Penal Code, § 1031:

"All admissions should be scanned with care, and confessions of guilt should be received with great caution. A confession alone, uncorroborated by other evidence, will not justify a conviction."

In Lee v. State, 76 Ga. 498, it was said:

"In a criminal case, the corpus delicti should be established beyond a reasonable doubt, or a conviction should not be had."

In defining "corpus delicti" Wharton says:

"It is made up of two elements: (1) That a certain result has been produced, as that a man has died, or a building has been burned, or a piece of property is not in the owner's possession. (2) That some one is criminally responsible for the result; e. g., on a charge of homicide, it is necessary to prove that the person alleged in the indictment to have been killed is (1) actually dead, as by producing his dead body; (2) that his death was caused or accomplished by violence, or other direct criminal agency of some other human being." 1 Whar. Cr. L. (11th Ed.) § 347.

In 1 Wharton's Criminal Evidence (10th Ed.) § 325d, it is said:

"The general rule in homicide is that the criminal agency—the cause of the death, the second element of the corpus delicti—may always be shown by circumstantial evidence. To sustain a conviction, proof of the criminal agency is as indispensable as the proof of death. The fact of death is not sufficient; it must affirmatively appear that the death was not accidental, that it was not due to natural causes, and that it was not due to the act of the deceased. * * * It must affirmatively appear that death resulted from criminal agency. But the criminal agency is sufficiently shown, where a dead body is found with injuries apparently sufficient to cause death, under circumstances which exclude inference of accident or suicide," etc.

In harmony with and in recognition of the principles stated in the foregoing excerpts taken from Wharton are numerous decisions of this court. In Thomas v. State, 67 Ga. 460, it was said:

"A dead body, found with a knife thrust across the throat and breast, sufficient to have caused death, and with no signs of accident or suicide about it, is sufficient to prove the corpus delicti of murder."

In Holsenbake v. State, 45 Ga. 43, 58, it was said:

"Our Code provides that 'a confession alone, uncorroborated by other evidence, will not justify a conviction.' It is contended that, by this clause of the Code, it is necessary there shall be corroboration of the confession in that part of it which acknowledges that the prisoner committed the crime. To make out any case of guilt, there are two essential ingredients: First, a crime, must be committed; and the person charged must be the party who committed it. One of these elements is just as essential as the other. If one confesses that he has committed a crime, that is not sufficient to convict. But, if it be proven that just such a crime as he acknowledges was in fact committed, does not this corroborate his confession? The Code does not fix the amount of corroboration. It does not say that it shall be corroborated in a number of particulars, but simply that a confession alone, uncorroborated by other evidence, shall not be sufficient. To require a confession to be corroborated in every particular would be to say that a confession is not sufficient, unless there be other evidence, sufficient without the confession, which would be absurd. We do not feel authorized to draw any line. The confession must be corroborated; but how far, and in what particulars, is not said. That there has been an unlawful killing is, in a case of a charge of murder, one particular, and an important one. Each case must stand on its own footing, the jury being the judges. And if they convict on a confession which is corroborated by only one circumstance, the rule is complied with; the strength of that circumstance is to be judged of by the jury, according to the case. In the case before us, the confession is in fact corroborated in several particulars. The prisoner admits enmity to the deceased; the killing was with the weapons mentioned; it was an assassination, as mentioned," etc.

See, also, Brown v. State, 105 Ga. 640, 31 S. E. 557. In Murray v. State, 43 Ga. 256, where, in a trial for arson in burning a gin-house, there was proof that the prisoner had confessed his guilt, saying that he had "put fire to it at 1 o'clock at night," and no corroborating circumstance was proved, except that the house was consumed by fire about the hour of 1 o'clock at night, and that the prisoner resided about a mile from the spot, it was held that such evidence did not justify a conviction and was insufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty. In Bines v. State, 118 Ga. 320, 323, 45 S. E. 376, 68 L. R. A. 33, it is said:

"Before there can be a lawful conviction of a crime, the corpus delicti—that is, that the crime charged has been committed by some one—must be proved."

In Williams v. State, 125 Ga. 741, 54 S. E. 661, it was said:

"When a house is consumed by fire, and nothing appears but that fact, the law rather implies that the fire was the result of accident, or some providential cause, than of a criminal design." Phillips v. State, 29 Ga. 105. * * * In the present case, when the confessions of the accused are eliminated, the other evidence is not sufficient to show beyond a reasonable doubt that there was a wilful and malicious burning of the house which was destroyed by fire."

See, also, Epps v. State, 149 Ga. 484, 100 S. E. 568.

[1, 2] Applying the foregoing principles to the evidence in the case under consideration, was the verdict finding the defendant guilty of murder sustained? The confession alone by the defendant on trial would not suffice, under the plain language of the Penal Code, unless it was corroborated by other evidence. The evidence as to exhibition of money by the defendant, under the circumstances detailed by the witness, would not corroborate the confession of the crime of murder, for several reasons; one reason being that there was no evidence that Henry Moody had any money at the time of the alleged homicide. With that question out of the way, the only remaining possible corroboration of the confession is the evidence as to the corpus delicti—that is, that the murder was committed. The evidence as to the finding of the dead body was sufficient to show the first element to be proved. The second element—that is, that the death of Henry Moody was caused by a criminal agency—was not sufficiently proved. One witness testified:

"I saw Henry Moody after he was killed."

Another witness, in testifying as to a confession, said:

"This was something like two or three days after the killing."

The employer of the deceased testified:

"I did not inspect the place where he was wounded; a great many of them did though. He was dead when I saw him. * * * I made no examination of him at all. I don't know what killed him."

The expressions above quoted were by witnesses who did not witness the alleged homicide, and are not to be construed as showing an intention upon the part of the witnesses to testify that the deceased was "killed," or that the witness saw wounds on the body of deceased, or that there were any wounds on the body of the deceased which would tend to show that they caused his death by any criminal agency. The presumption is that the deceased came to his death by natural causes, and the evidence submitted was insufficient to overcome such presumption. The mere fact that the body was found on the floor was consistent with the theory of death by natural causes. Applying the rule that, "in a criminal case, the corpus delicti should be established beyond a reasonable doubt, or a conviction should not be had," the evidence was insufficient. Omitting from consideration the confession of the accused, as it should be, because it was not corroborated, the verdict finding the defendant guilty was unauthorized by the evidence, and the judge erred in refusing a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

NEAL v. STATE. (No. 2442.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 12, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Criminal law \S 824(4)—Failure to charge without request to acquit if killing was accident, as contended by defendant, held not error.

Where defendant charged with murder relied on the defense of misfortune or accident, and the trial judge correctly charged thereon, it was not error, in the absence of a written request, to fail to charge that, if the jury believed the killing was an accident as contended for by defendant in his statement, they should find a verdict of not guilty.

Error from Superior Court, Houston County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Miller Neal was convicted of homicide, and he brings error. Affirmed.

John B. Cooper and W. O. Cooper, Jr., both of Macon, and Marx Kunz, of Perry, for plaintiff in error.

Chas. H. Garrett, Sol. Gen., of Macon, R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., and Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

GILBERT, J. 1. Where one who is charged with the murder of his wife relies upon the defense of misfortune or accident, and the trial judge has correctly given in charge to the jury the law on that subject, it is not error, in the absence of a written request so to do, for the court to fail to instruct the jury that, if they believe the killing was an accident as contended for by the defendant in his statement, the jury should find a verdict of not guilty. Josey v. State, 137 Ga. 769 (3), 74 S. E. 282; Jones v. State, 147 Ga. 356 (2), 94 S. E. 248.

2. None of the excerpts from the charge of the court upon which error is assigned, when considered in connection with the charge in its entirety, were erroneous. Assignments of error on failures of the court to charge are without merit.

3. The verdict is supported by evidence. The court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

KING v. KING. (No. 2141.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 12, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

I. Divorce \S 255—Judgment denying divorce to either party held not to bar wife's subsequent action for alimony.

Where a husband brought a libel for divorce against his wife, and the wife in a cross-action prayed for a divorce from the husband and for temporary and permanent alimony, and the jury on the first trial of the divorce suit returned a verdict against a divorce for both parties, and the suit thereupon terminated in a judgment denying to both the husband and the wife a divorce as prayed, the verdict and judgment in the divorce suit is no bar to a suit for permanent alimony subsequently brought by the wife for herself and minor child against the husband, although the grounds set up in such suit for alimony were pleaded as grounds for divorce and alimony in the cross-action filed by the wife to the husband's libel for divorce.

2. Sufficiency of evidence and motion for new trial.

The verdict for permanent alimony for the wife and minor child is supported by the evidence. The judgment overruling the defendant's motion for new trial is not erroneous for any reason assigned.

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; M. O. Tarver, Judge.

Action by Essie King against O. L. King. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

M. B. Eubanks, of Rome, and R. H. House, of Donaldsonville, for plaintiff in error.

Maddox, McCamy & Shumate and F. K. McCutchen, all of Dalton, for defendant in error.

GEORGE, J. O. L. King filed a libel for divorce against his wife, Mrs. Essie King, to the July term, 1919, of Whitfield superior court. Mrs. King filed a cross-petition praying for a divorce and for temporary as well as permanent alimony for herself and minor child. On the first trial of the action the jury returned a verdict finding against the divorce for both parties. Upon this verdict the court rendered a judgment denying to both parties the relief prayed. Subsequently Mrs. King brought an action for alimony for herself and minor child; and the defendant, O. L. King, contested her right to alimony, pleading the judgment in the divorce suit in bar of her right to prosecute the suit for alimony. In her suit for alimony Mrs. King alleged the same facts pleaded in her cross-action for divorce and alimony. Upon motion the court amended the judgment in the divorce suit, and the judgment as amended merely denied to both parties the divorce prayed. Thereafter the court dismissed the plea of res adjudicata as insufficient, and the ruling of the court in dismissing this plea is the controlling question presented by this record.

[1] Civil Code 1910, \S 2954, provides, among other things, that—

"The jury rendering the final verdict in the cause [that is to say, in a libel for divorce] may provide permanent alimony for the wife, either from the corpus of the estate or otherwise, according to the condition of the husband and the source from which the property came into the coverture."

Section 2981 provides:

"If the jury, on the second or final verdict, find in favor of the wife, they shall also, in providing permanent alimony for her, specify what amount the minor children shall be entitled to for their permanent support."

From the foregoing sections it is obvious that the wife's claim for alimony was not involved in the first trial of the divorce suit. Her claim for alimony could only be considered by the jury upon the final or second trial of the divorce suit. Inasmuch as the decree or judgment in the divorce suit was rendered on the first verdict of the jury in that action, the question of permanent alimony for the wife and minor child was not affected by the decree or judgment. Her claim for alimony, as set forth in her cross-petition for divorce, was based upon the allegation that a suit for divorce was pending between the parties. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the verdict and judgment in the divorce suit is not a bar to the wife's suit for permanent alimony, although in her cross-petition in the divorce suit she had pleaded the same matter as ground for divorce, and as a basis for her claim of alimony for herself and child, as she now pleads in her alimony suit. See Mitchell v. Mitchell, 97 Ga. 795, 25 S. E. 385; Sumner v. Sumner, 121 Ga. 1, 48 S. E. 727; Bishop v. Bishop, 124 Ga. 293, 52 S. E. 743.

[2] The further assignments of error contained in the bill of exceptions afford no reason for setting aside the verdict finding permanent alimony for the wife and minor child, and are not of such character as to require discussion.

Judgment affirmed.

ROE v. WATSON. (No. 2225.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 12, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Divorce \S 269(10)—Motion to dismiss unsworn petition to punish for nonpayment of alimony properly denied.

Where there was a judgment awarding alimony, which the husband subsequently failed to pay in the monthly installments as provided in the judgment, and a petition was filed by the wife, praying that the husband be required to show cause why he should not pay the alimony or be punished for contempt, it was not error to refuse to dismiss such petition on the ground that it is not sworn to.

2. Divorce \S 269(2, 13)—Nonpayment of alimony may be punished as contempt; husband could not complain of time allowed for payment.

The judgment requiring the payment of alimony within the time specified, and in default of such payment that the defendant be incarcerated, was authorized under the pleadings and the evidence.

Error from Superior Court, Berrien County; R. G. Dickerson, Judge.

Application of A. R. Watson against Jacob Roe for attachment for contempt. Judgment requiring defendant to pay arrears of alimony within 60 days, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Story & Story, of Nashville, for plaintiff in error.

W. D. Bule, of Nashville, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. Amy Roe Watson made her application to the superior court for the issuance of a rule to require Jacob Roe to show cause why he should not be attached for contempt because of his failure to comply with an order and judgment of the court previously granted, awarding alimony to the applicant. It was alleged that the movant had been awarded in said court the sum of $17.50 permanent alimony to be paid monthly, that after a few payments of this sum the defendant failed and refused to make further payments, and that he was in arrears at the time of filing the petition, in the amount of $157.50. The court issued a rule nisi calling upon the defendant to show cause why he should not be attached for contempt, etc. At the hearing the respondent made a motion to dismiss the petition or application, on the ground that it was not sworn to, which motion was overruled; and after hearing evidence the court further adjudged that the defendant should pay the amount of the alimony for which he was in arrears within 60 days, and, upon his failure and refusal to do so, that he should be confined in jail. The respondent excepted to the judgment denying his motion to dismiss the petition, and also to the order requiring the sheriff, in the event of failure to pay the alimony within 60 days, to incarcerate the respondent.

[1, 2] There was no error in refusing to dismiss the application for the issuance of the rule nisi. There is no provision in the statute requiring such petitions or applications or motions to be sworn to. Civil Code, \S 5431; 6 R. C. L. 531. It might be proper for the judge, before issuing the rule nisi, to require an applicant to make a showing upon oath that the facts stated in the petition for such a rule nisi were true; but where he issues the rule upon the written representations of an applicant, and there is proper service, and the respondent is brought before the court, the court may, upon sufficient evidence showing that the respondent has failed and refused to comply with the decree awarding alimony, adjudge him in contempt; and further, that in the event of his failure to comply with the judgment, he be incarcerated. The fact that in the present case the judge allowed the defendant 60 days within which to pay the amount of alimony in arrears at the time of the judgment was not a matter of which the respondent could complain.

Under the evidence submitted, the judge was authorized to find that the plaintiff in error was in contempt, and that he had not purged himself thereof.

Judgment affirmed.

CARROLL v. ATLANTIC STEEL CO.
(No. 2195.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Infants  110—Consent judgment for damages for injuries vacated where proceedings were formal and without judicial investigation.

Where proceedings in court for a minor by next friend to recover damages for injuries sustained by the minor from alleged negligence of the defendant are merely formal and are brought in the name of the minor by an attorney employed by a company which has insured the defendant against damages resulting from injuries to defendant's employees, only to effectuate a settlement alleged to have been agreed upon between the parties, and where in such case verdict and judgment for a nominal amount are taken for the plaintiff, and there is no judicial investigation of the facts upon which the right or extent of the recovery is based, a judgment rendered in pursuance of such agreement, even if by consent, is only colorable, and will be set aside in a proper proceeding, when its effect, if allowed to stand, would be to bar the infant's substantial rights.

2. Nonsuit held erroneous.

The court erred, under the pleadings and the evidence, in awarding a nonsuit.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by Clarence Carroll, by his next friend, Odessa Carroll, against the Atlantic Steel Company. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Clarence Carroll, suing by Odessa Carroll, as his next friend, brought an equitable petition against the Atlantic Steel Company, and alleged in substance as follows:

About May 13, 1918, while employed by the defendant, the plaintiff was injured and damaged in the sum of $25,000, having lost his left leg through the defendant's negligence. About September 3, 1918, the plaintiff believed that he effected a valid settlement of his damages by having received a contract for permanent employment with the defendant, and continued in such belief until about May 1, 1919, when he was discharged by the defendant; and, having employed counsel, he has been told that on September 3, 1918, a judgment was rendered in the city court of Atlanta in his favor as plaintiff against the defendant for the sum of $450, by which it was attempted to fully satisfy plaintiff's claim. The judgment was obtained by fraud by the defendant and is void; and the present suit is brought for the purpose of setting aside the judgment, and for damages for the tort referred to.

The fraud complained of was as follows: On May 13, 1918, the plaintiff received an injury while working for the defendant, which resulted in the amputation of his left leg. After several weeks, and after plaintiff had partially recovered from his injuries, the superintendent of the defendant sent for the mother of plaintiff, for the purpose of making a settlement. Plaintiff and his mother went to the plant of the defendant, where they met the superintendent and the insurance adjuster hereinafter referred to. A settlement was agreed upon by the superintendent and plaintiff's mother, upon the following terms: Defendant was to pay plaintiff's mother $350 in full settlement for her damages ($50 of which had already been paid), and give permanent employment to plaintiff, and an artificial leg as soon as he was fully grown. Plaintiff and his mother were then told by the superintendent to get into defendant's automobile in company with its physician and go to the office of defendant's attorney, who would pay the $300. The defendant carried insurance against loss for damages to employees with the Travelers' Insurance Company. The adjuster for the insurance company had employed the attorney of defendant before their arrival at his office. The insurance company, through its adjuster, gave instructions to the attorney as to what to do regarding the settlement; and the attorney followed the instructions, and his employment was from the insurance company acting for the defendant, and not for plaintiff or his mother, and he was paid by the insurance company, and he recognized and considered that he was representing the insurance company, and not plaintiff or his mother. The defendant and the insurance adjuster fraudulently withheld from the attorney the information regarding the lifetime employment for plaintiff. The attorney gave plaintiff's mother $10 to bind the settlement with her, and told her to return in September and he would pay her the balance of $290. Plaintiff alleges that he and his mother relied on the confidence and the honesty of the agents of the defendant, because they were ignorant in such matters, could not read or write, and were not able to understand the methods necessary to effect a valid settlement on the terms mentioned. Plaintiff's mother in September, 1918, received $290 in accordance with the terms of settlement. Neither plaintiff nor his mother was told by defendant or by the attorney that a suit was to be brought; and the suit referred to was wholly without the authority, knowledge, or consent of plaintiff or his mother. The defendant did give plaintiff employment for a few months, but about May 1, 1919, without cause discharged him. He and his mother did not know that the contract relating to employment should have been entered into in writing and made a part of the judgment of the court, and they accepted the money believing that the other terms of the settlement were binding on the defendant and would be carried out in good faith with plaintiff.

There was great disparity between the mental ability of plaintiff and his mother and the agents of the defendant, and especially the adjuster. This fact, coupled with the other fact that defendant only paid $350 to satisfy a just claim of $25,000, is fraud; and the plaintiff sets this up as an additional ground for disregarding the judgment herein referred to. He has been advised by counsel that a named attorney on June 27, 1918, filed a suit in behalf of plaintiff by his mother, as next friend, against the defendant, for the sum of $25,000, a copy of which petition is annexed hereto. The defendant filed its answer to the suit, copy of which is also attached. The name of W. P. Tillinghast appears as defendant's attorney. Plaintiff is advised that Tillinghast was really one of the insurance adjusters for the Travelers' Insurance Company, and had no retainer or authority as attorney directly from the defendant, and that on September 3, 1918, a consent verdict and judgment were taken in the case for $450 and cost, a copy of which verdict and judgment are attached to this petition. The named attorney who filed the suit on June 27, 1918, filed with the clerk of the superior court a next friend's bond, and furnished as security a clerk employed by the attorney at that time. The filing of the suit, the taking of the verdict and judgment, and the executing of the bond were all without the knowledge, authority, or consent of plaintiff and his mother. The effect of the action of the defendant through its agents employing the named attorney and not carrying out the contract of settlement made was a fraud upon plaintiff. Plaintiff has just discovered the fraud, and comes into a court of equity and asks relief against such judgment. The money received by his mother was tendered to the defendant.

The merits of his action against the defendant arise out of the following facts: The defendant is a corporation engaged in the manufacture of iron and steel products; and to this end it uses in and about its plant locomotives, cars, and railroad tracks. On May 13, 1918, the plaintiff was in the employment of the defendant at its plant. The particular work which he was employed to do was to clean pans from engines in the yard; and this was a safe place at which to work. It was specifically agreed between his mother (he being a minor and under her care and custody) and the superintendent of the defendant that plaintiff was not to be given dangerous employment; and his mother warned the superintendent not to place her son at work on the cars or engines of the railroad, and it was then agreed by the superintendent that he should not be so placed. He was young and inexperienced, being 17 years of age and small for his age, being of the size and development of a boy about 14 or 15 years of age. He did not know the dangers incident to coupling and switching cars and performing the duties of a switchman; and on account of his inexperience and immature judgment he was not cognizant of the obvious danger to which he was exposed, and did not appreciate the same. Although the defendant knew of his youth, inexperience, and inability to comprehend the dangers of his employment, and knew that he was not cognizant of the dangers, he received no instructions and was not warned of the danger. On the date of the injury he was placed at work coupling cars in the yards where there was an engine known as a "dinkey engine" used in switching cars. The cars being switched were equipped with pans in which were loaded scrap iron. Usually a car has four pans which extend up to either end of the car, and the engine is coupled to cars by means of a bolt or rod about three feet long, which fits over a catch or device which thus attaches the engine to the cars. On the night the injury occurred the "dinkey engine" was backing up to take on a train of about three cars which had just been set in from an adjoining track. Plaintiff gave the signal for the engineer to back up so as to get close enough to make the coupling. The engine came back, but owing to defective brakes it could not be stopped by the engineer in time; and while plaintiff was holding the three-foot coupling bolt and was ready to fit it in place so as to complete the coupling, and while in the exercise of his duty in that regard, the force of the engine, which was beyond the control of the engineer because of the defective brakes, drove the bolt and the engine up to, against, and upon the car in such a way as to catch plaintiff's leg and almost sever it from his body. The car next to the "dinkey engine" was a three-pan car, and there was room for the engine to be pushed upon it so as to be on the space usually occupied by the pan. There was no escape from being caught. The engine came suddenly and unexpectedly, and plaintiff could not have avoided the accident. The engine should have been equipped with bumpers, or other device designed to protect persons who couple cars. Plaintiff objected to the new employment, and asked to remain on his old job; but he was told by the foreman that he could do the work all right, and that he must do it or be discharged; and, disregarding the agreement with his mother, defendant forced him from a safe place, that of cleaning pans, to a place as switchman coupling cars at night in the railroad yards operated by the defendant. A number of acts of negligence on the part of the defendant are alleged.

Plaintiff was without fault, and his injuries were the result of negligence and carelessness on the part of the defendant. At the time of the injuries plaintiff was strong and healthy, and earning the sum of $2.50 a day; and but for the injury he would now be able to earn at least $4 per day. His injuries are permanent, and he will always be a cripple; his earning capacity has been diminished at least one-half as the result of losing his leg; he has suffered much pain and agony, and continues to suffer pain. The prayer is that the verdict and judgment for the sum of $450 and costs in favor of the plaintiff be declared a nullity, and that he have judgment in the sum of $25,000 for his damages.

The defendant filed an answer in which it denied all the material allegations of the petition, and averred that the claim of the plaintiff for the injuries sustained was settled by defendant with plaintiff and his mother, that his suit was filed to legally effect said settlement, that the attorney in that suit was regularly employed by plaintiff and his mother and represented them, and that in and about the suit and the settlement there was no fraud or misrepresentation of any kind; and defendant pleads the verdict and judgment in that suit in full settlement and satisfaction of the alleged claim set forth in the present suit and in bar of any recovery. After evidence was offered by the plaintiff the court awarded a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted.

W. S. Dillon, C. M. Lancaster, and Wm. J. Davis, Jr., all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

C. T. & J. L. Hopkins and McDaniel & Black, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] This was an equitable action brought by Clarence Carroll, a minor, by his mother as next friend, to set aside a judgment rendered in the city court of Atlanta on September 3, 1913, in his favor against the Atlantic Steel Company as defendant, in which a verdict and judgment were entered for $450, by which it was attempted to fully satisfy the plaintiff's claim for damages against the defendant, alleged to have been sustained by him while an employee of the defendant. The petition also had for its purpose the recovery of damages to the amount of $25,000. One of the questions to be determined in the case is whether, under the allegations of the petition and the evidence thereunder, the verdict and judgment of the city court should be set aside on the ground of fraud in their procurement, and the plaintiff be allowed to go to the jury on the questions at issue in the case.

The case of Missouri Pacific Ry. Co. v. Charles Lasca, 79 Kan. 311, 99 Pac. 616, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 338, 17 Ann. Cas. 605, was similar in its facts to the instant case. There, in a suit commenced by Charles Lasca, a minor six years of age, by Nick Lasca, his father and next friend, to set aside a judgment rendered in the same court in favor of Nick Lasca and Anna Lasca, father and mother and next friends of Charles Lasca, a minor, plaintiff, against the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, defendant, for $96 and costs, the petition alleged that the defendant caused the judgment to be rendered against itself; that there was no trial upon the pleadings and proofs, nor upon the merits of the case, and no proof was made and no evidence offered and no damages assessed by the court; that the proceeding was without the knowledge or consent of Nick Lasca or Anna Lasca, and the judgment was obtained for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff by barring the cause of action set up in the petition therein; that the plaintiff had a good cause of action for injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant, and still had such cause of action, unless barred by the judgment, which he asked to have set aside accordingly. The defendant answered by a general denial and a plea to the jurisdiction of the court. Upon the trial of that case the court made findings of fact from which it appears that Nick Lasca, an Italian employee of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, with Anna, his wife, and their son, Charles, about 18 months of age, were living in a bunk car on a side track. Another car, upon which was a water tank, was standing near by on another side track. Mrs. Lasca went to the water tank to draw water for domestic use, leaving the boy with his grandmother in the bunk car. While the mother was thus absent the boy left the bunk car, went to the other side track, and put his hands on the rail near the tank car. Just at that time an incoming freight train moved the tank car so that a wheel passed over the boy's hands, crushing and bruising them. Negotiations were opened between the defendant's claim agent and the parents of the child, resulting in an agreement in writing whereby the parents agreed to accept $100 from the defendant in full of all claims for the injury, to be paid through a friendly suit to be instituted in a certain court. This sum was to cover all claims of the parents as well as of Charles Lasca, and was to be divided as the attorneys for the defendant might deem proper. In pursuance of this agreement the parents went to the office of the defendant's attorney at the request of the claim agent, and there met the company's attorneys and Pittman, another attorney, who was then in the office, with whom they consulted about the matter. The petition, answer, and reply in the proposed action had been prepared by the defendant's attorneys. The petition and reply were signed by Pittman as attorney for the plaintiff; the papers being entitled "Nick Lasca and Anna Lasca, Father and Mother and Next Friends of Charles Lasca, a Minor, Plaintiff, v. The Missouri Pacific Railway Company, Defendant." The petition stated a cause of action for the injuries to Charles Lasca, and prayed for a judgment for $100. The answer contained a general denial and a plea of contributory negligence, and was signed by the defendant's attorneys. Nick Lasca and Anna Lasca and the attorneys named then proceeded to the court of common pleas, filed the papers, and presented them to the court; and the attorney for the defendant informed the court that this was a friendly suit for the settlement of the claim against the company, and that he wished to have judgment entered against the company, in accordance with the settlement, for $95 and cost. The judge, the court being regularly in session, then called Nick Lasca and Anna Lasca and inquired of them whether the settlement was satisfactory. They stated that it was, and that they desired to have judgment entered accordingly. The judge informed them that, if a judgment was entered, it would cut off all claims of the child for further damages; and thereupon judgment was entered for $95 and costs, by consent of the parties. There was no trial of the issues; and no evidence was introduced, except the statement of the parties present to the effect that the child had been injured by the defendant company, and that the parents had effected a compromise and settlement, and that the amount agreed upon was satisfactory. The judge made an entry upon his trial docket as follows:

"September 9, 1901. Judgment for plaintiff for $95 and costs, by consent and agreement of all parties."

Thereupon a judgment was entered upon the journal of the court in ordinary form, etc. In affirming a later ruling of the trial court setting aside this judgment, the Supreme Court of Kansas, speaking through Benson, J., said:

"While in this case the court did exercise some supervision over the agreement, it did not judicially examine the facts to determine whether the agreement was reasonable and proper. The court merely approved what the next friend had done, not because it found that it was for the best interests of the infant, but because the consent of the parents had been given and they were still satisfied. The duty of the court, stated in many decisions, and referred to in the recent case of Crapster v. Taylor, 74 Kan. 771, 87 Pac. 1138, to protect the interests of infants, was not performed by inquiring of the parents if they were satisfied with the agreement. It may be that some of the cases above cited have carried the doctrine to an extreme limit. The next friend must not be denied such necessary incidental powers as will facilitate the fair adjudication of the infant's rights. This is necessary to their proper vindication, both in prosecution and defense. Where a compromise is fairly incidental to an action regularly brought, and is upon due judicial examination approved, the judgment, if not otherwise impeached, may be conclusive as in the case of adults; but where the proceedings in court are merely formal and instituted and carried on only to give an apparent sanction to the agreement, and there is no judicial investigation of the facts upon which the right or extent of the recovery is based, the judgment so entered by consent is only colorable, and must be set aside in a proper proceeding when its effect, if allowed to stand, would be to bar the infant's rights. In such a case the proceeding in court should be regarded as but merely formal and as intended solely to employ the functions and powers of the court to give validity to the prior agreement." Pittsburg, C., C. & St. L. R. R. Co. v. Haley, supra, 170 Ill. 610, 48 N. E. 920. See, also, Long v. Mulford, 17 Ohio St. 484, 93 Am. Dec. 688; Waterman v. Lawrence, 19 Cal. 210, 79 Am. Dec. 212; Kromer v. Friday, 10 Wash. 621, 89 Pac. 229, 32 L. R. A. 671, and note; Gooch v. Green, 102 Ill. 507; Ralston v. Lahee, 8 Iowa, 17, 74 Am. Dec. 208. The conclusion of the trial court that no fraud in fact was committed in this transaction cannot affect the right of the infant to relief. The judgment so set aside would have been an absolute bar to the prosecution of his claim, and thus he would have been deprived of his legal rights without authority. The motive of the actors does not avoid the consequences of the act. The parents had no power to consent to the judgment; having no other sanction, it cannot stand."

And see, to the same effect, Leslie v. Proctor & Gamble Mfg. Co., 102 Kan. 159, 169 Pac. 193, L. R. A. 1918C, 55, and notes. In the latter case it was held that—

"Where a minor has sustained personal injuries, which his father and the wrongdoer settled for an inadequate sum, such minor on attaining his majority may bring an action against the wrongdoer for his injuries, notwithstanding the settlement negotiated by his father."

See, also, as to the powers and duties of next friends and guardians ad litem, 14 R. C. L. 288, 289, § 56, and cases cited.

Without adopting the views of the court in the Lasca Case, supra, in extenso, we think the ruling upon the question we are now considering is sound. This is not a case where a lawyer is really employed by the parties and a judgment is entered under a bona fide agreement of settlement. The attorney in this case, while nominally representing the plaintiffs, was, as a matter of fact, employed by the adjuster of the insurance company to effect the settlement for the steel company. The attorney testified that—

"Mr. Coppix [the insurance adjuster] phoned me that he had a case that he wanted to give me, and I told him I would be glad to get it. He said he had a boy injured by the steel company, and they had agreed upon a settlement of the case, and that it would be necessary, he being a minor, to take a consent verdict in it, and that he would send the boy to my office, which he did. In about an hour after that they came to my office. I had never seen them before, and didn't know anything about them until that occurred. They told me the same that Mr. Coppix had, and wanted the suit filed so they could get their money; and I took the case for the steel company. Mr. Coppix said he would pay my fees in addition to what he would pay them, which he did. Mr. Coppix told me they had agreed upon a settlement of $300. * * * I think my fee was $150. I did not introduce any evidence in behalf of the plaintiff to the court and jury when the verdict was taken. No, sir; the court did not ask the plaintiff any questions as to the merits of the case. Odessa Carroll and Clarence Carroll were not present at the trial when the verdict was taken. No, sir; I did not notify Odessa Carroll or Clarence Carroll to be in court that day; it wasn't necessary; they knew when the court was to meet," etc.

It will be observed that in the Lasca Case, supra, the parents of the minor child did go before the court and stated that they desired to have judgment entered according to the agreement they had entered into. But in the present case the record shows that neither the plaintiff nor his mother, who was acting as next friend for him, went before the court, and no testimony was offered as to the merits of the case, and these were not inquired into by the court. The petition in the case alleges a cause of action, and under it the plaintiff sought to recover $25,000 damages for the loss of his leg. The damages alleged were far in excess of the amount paid. The evidence of the plaintiff was sufficient to authorize a jury to find for the plaintiff in some substantial amount for the injury alleged to have been sustained by him. Besides the amount which was actually paid, the sum of $300 was paid to the mother as next friend, and not to the plaintiff. The evidence of the plaintiff was to the effect that in the agreement of settlement he was to receive a lifetime job with the defendant; and in corroboration of this contention on the part of the plaintiff he was given employment after he had recovered from the amputation of his leg. He was receiving the sum of $3.50 per day as wages when hurt, and $2.80 per day when he was discharged, and received no further compensation for his injury. It is true that the evidence is conflicting upon the question as to whether, under the terms of the settlement, the plaintiff was to receive a lifetime job with the defendant; and this being so, we think the case should have been submitted to a jury under proper instructions. Under the facts of this case we hold that no settlement was made that had judicial sanction. The settlement was made out of court, and the verdict and judgment were purely perfunctory, and no investigation was made before the court and jury as to the reasonableness of the settlement and as to whether the verdict and the judgment covered the agreement which was really made between the plaintiff and the defendant. And we think that in such a case, where the proceedings in court are merely formal and are instituted and carried out in order to give an apparent sanction to the settlement, and there is no judicial investigation of the facts upon which the right or extent of the recovery of damages by a minor is based, such a judgment entered in pursuance of the agreement and by consent merely is only colorable, and will be set aside in a proper proceeding, when its effect, if allowed to stand, would be to bar the infant's substantial rights. Mo. Pac. Ry. Co. v. Lasca.

(No. 12095.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
April 13, 1921.)*(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)Private roads \S 2(1)—Facts held not to show existence of right.

Where there was no evidence of a gift or dedication to the public of the land over which an alleged private road leading to a creek ran, and the creek itself could have been fenced, and there was no evidence that the alleged private way was not over 15 feet wide, it was error to order the removal of obstructions.

Hartsfield & Conger, of Bainbridge, for defendants in error.

PER CURIAM. This case arose upon a petition to the ordinary to require the defendants to remove obstructions from an alleged private way. The evidence shows that the defendants were the owners of certain lands and to the run of a creek over which people in the community had been traveling to reach the creek for picnicking, fishing, bathing, and for the purpose of baptizing converts of several churches in the neighborhood. The evidence shows that several of the plaintiffs had leased this way from the owners, but that the lease had expired before this proceeding was begun. The evidence further showed that in addition to this short alleged private way, there was a public road which reached the creek a short distance from the particular point at which the alleged private way touched the creek. It appeared from the evidence that the owners of the land fenced up this alleged private way into their inclosed lands, for the purpose of keeping their stock from running at large. It further appeared from the evidence that this alleged private way had been used from 15 to 25 years for the purposes hereinbefore set out. The ordinary, on the trial of this issue, passed an order requiring the removal of the fence which closed the alleged private way. The defendants presented to the judge of the superior court a petition for certiorari, which he sanctioned, and upon the answer of the ordinary, which adopted the petition for certiorari as true, the judge overruled and denied the certiorari. Error is assigned on this judgment. Held, an examination of the evidence in this case does not show that the plaintiffs were entitled to have removed, by order of court, the obstructions from the alleged private way. There was no evidence which implied a gift or a dedication to the public of the land over which this alleged private way ran. In fact, the leasing of it by certain of the plaintiffs indicated that no prescriptive rights had accrued to the public. The creek, which was used for fishing and bathing and as a baptizing place, certainly could have been fenced, and the very use which the plaintiffs claimed they had for it would have been defeated. It appeared from the evidence that there were other places on the creek which could be used for fishing, bathing, and baptizing. There was also a public road which reached the creek a short distance from the particular point. In connection with what we have here held, see Ga. R. R. & Banking Co. v. City of Atlanta, 118 Ga. 486, 45 S. E. 256. In addition to what we have said the evidence did not show that the alleged private way was not over 15 feet wide. It follows that it was error to overrule the certiorari. Judgment reversed.

1. Criminal law \S 805(1)—Correct instruction not erroneous because of failure to charge some other legal principle.

A charge which is abstractly correct is not rendered erroneous by a failure to charge some other legal principle applicable to the case.

2. Criminal law \S 828—Failure to charge that burden was on state to prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt not error without written request.

Where the charge on reasonable doubt sufficiently informed the jury that the burden was on the state, the failure to charge specifically that the burden was on the state to establish defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt was not error in the absence of a timely and appropriate written request.

1. Contracts ¶10(4)—When there is written order and written acceptance it is not a unilateral contract.

A contract, consisting of a written and signed order for specified goods at stated prices and a signed acceptance of the order, is not unilateral under Park's Ann. Civ. Code, § 4230.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Unilateral Contract.]

2. Evidence ¶419(15)—Real consideration may be inquired into as between maker and payee.

Where a promissory note contains no recital of consideration except the words "for value received," the real consideration may be inquired into in a suit by the payee against the maker, as far as may be necessary to the defense pleaded.

3. Evidence ¶419(15)—Parol agreement that note for money actually received was to be set off against maker's claims cannot be shown.

Though a note recites no consideration except "value received," where it was given for money actually received by the maker from the payee, a parol agreement that it was to be set off against the maker's demands against the payee cannot be ingrafted thereon under Civ. Code 1910, §§ 4268, 5788, 5791, relative to parol evidence.

4. Sales ¶353(2)—Seller suing for price of rejected goods must allege that he retained and stored them for buyer.

Where the buyer refused to take and pay for goods, the seller cannot recover the entire purchase price in an action on the contract, and not for its breach, without alleging that he stored or retained them for the buyer pursuant to Civ. Code 1910, § 4131.

5. Pleading ¶352—Proceedings subsequent to erroneous refusal to strike plea are nugatory.

Where the court erred in failing to strike defendant's plea on motion, all subsequent proceedings in the case were nugatory.

LUKE, J. [1] 1. A contract is not unilateral where it consists of a written and signed order for specified goods at stated prices and of the addressee's written and signed acceptance of the order. See Park's Ann. Code, § 4230, with annotations under the catchword "Unilateral."

[2] 2. Where a promissory note recites no consideration except in the words "for value received," and suit is brought thereon by the payee against the maker, the real consideration of the note may be inquired into as far as may be necessary to the defense pleaded.

[3] 3. But in a suit by the payee against the maker of a promissory note reciting that it was given "for value received," a contemporaneous parol agreement cannot be ingrafted thereon by the defendant by testimony to the effect that, while the defendant at the time of executing the note, actually received from the plaintiff the principal sum thereof, yet the defendant had a prior cause of action against the plaintiff, "and said note was to be a set off against the demands of said [defendant] against said [plaintiff] in this case, and was so understood at the time of the execution and delivery of said note." Civil Code 1910, §§ 4268, 5788, 5791; Chamberlin & Co. v. Beck, Gregg & Co., 68 Ga. 346 (5). The alleged parol agreement being inconsistent with the unambiguous terms of the note sued on, the portion of the plea above indicated set forth no defense.

[4] 4. The remainder of the plea being a cross-action upon a contract, and not an action for a breach thereof, to recover the entire purchase price of goods which the plaintiff had bought from the defendant, but had refused to take and pay for, and it being nowhere alleged that defendant had stored or retained the property for the vendee, in accordance with the terms of section 4131 of Civil Code 1910, the plea as a whole set forth no valid defense, and was subject to the motion to dismiss, presented at the trial of the case. Oklahoma Vinegar Co. v. Carter, 116 Ga. 140, 42 S. E. 878, 59 L. R. A. 122, 94 Am. St. Rep. 112.

1. Trial \Leftarrow 170—Verdict properly directed when demanded.

Where a verdict for plaintiff for the full amount of the principal and interest sued for was demanded by the pleadings and evidence, it was not error to direct a verdict.

2. Bills and notes \Leftarrow 534—Attorney's fees not recoverable when notice not given 10 days before filing suit.

In an action on a note providing for attorney's fees, such fees are not recoverable under Civ. Code 1910, § 4252, where suit was filed 3 days after notice was given that suit would be brought, though the notice was given more than 10 days before the return day of the term of court stated therein.

BROYLES, C. J. [1] 1. Under the pleadings and the evidence a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the full amount of the principal and interest sued for was demanded, and the court did not err in so directing.

[2] 2. The note sued upon contained the usual stipulations as to the payment of attorney's fees, and it was alleged in the petition that 10 days before the filing of the suit written notice was given the defendant that suit upon the note would be filed, returnable to the May term, 1919, of Candler superior court, and that the plaintiffs would claim the 10 per cent. attorney's fees stipulated in the note. Upon the trial, however, it was shown that the suit was filed 3 days after the above notice was given the defendant, although the notice was given more than 10 days before the return day of the term of court stated. The defendant not having been given the notice 10 days before the suit was brought, the plaintiffs were not entitled to collect any attorney's fees, and the court erred in including such fees in his directed verdict in favor of the plaintiffs. Civil Code, § 4252; Finch v. Cox, 18 Ga. App. 284(1), 89 S. E. 459; Stone v. Marshall & Co., 137 Ga. 544, 73 S. E. 826.

3. Under the rulings in the preceding notes the judgment is affirmed on condition that at the time the remittitur is made the judgment of the lower court the plaintiffs write off from the verdict and judgment the sum of $224.75, the amount of the attorney's fees found by the jury; otherwise the judgment is reversed.

In a proceeding under a distress warrant, an instruction that, if the jury found in accordance with the tenant's contention as to the amount of rent due, and that prior to the institution of the distress warrant he had tendered that amount, he would not be liable for the costs, if erroneous, was immaterial, where the jury found in accordance with the landlord's contention as to the amount due.

Error from Superior Court, DeKalb County; John B. Hutcheson, Judge.

Proceeding under distress warrant by H. W. Chamblee against V. E. Elrod. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

A. M. Brand, of Lithonia, for plaintiff in error.

L. J. Steele, of Decatur, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. [1, 2] 1. This was a proceeding under a distress warrant. The landlord claimed that the amount due under the rent contract was 1,000 pounds of lint cotton, and that its value was 32½ cents a pound at the time it became due. The tenant claimed that the agreed rental was $225 in money. The tenant testified that he had tendered the $225 in cash to the landlord before the issuance of the distress warrant. The landlord, while admitting the tender, testified that he did not remember whether it was made just before or just after the issuance of the distress warrant. The jury found for the landlord a sum in accordance with his contention as to the terms of the contract. The defendant excepted to a portion of the charge of the court, which was to the effect that, if the jury should find in accordance with the defendant's contention as to the amount of rent due, and that prior to the institution of the distress warrant he had tendered that amount, he would not be liable for the costs. Held, while a charge should be relevant and so adjusted to the pleadings and the evidence as not to interject any principle or theory not thus authorized (McConnell Bros. v. Slappey, 134 Ga. 95 [7], 87 S. E. 440; Peagler v. Davis, 143 Ga. 11 [6], 84 S. E. 59, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 232; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Arant, 143 Ga. 561, 85 S. E. 709; Georgia Cotton Oil Co. v. Jackson, 112 Ga. 620, 37 S. E. 873), the determination of any issuable question of fact lies within the province of the jury.

[3] Where the evidence on such a question is undisputed, the judge may, but is not required to, state or assume that such a fact has been proved. New Ware Furniture Co. v. Reynolds, 16 Ga. App. 19 (1, a), 84 S. E. 491; Jones v. Wall, 22 Ga. App. 513 (2), 96 S. E. 344; Ga. Fla. & Ala. Ry. Co. v. Jernigan, 128 Ga. 501 (1), 57 S. E. 791.

[4] Furthermore, the charge complained of could not in any possible event be accounted as reversible error, since the verdict, in accordance with the plaintiff's contention as to the amount of rent due under the contract, rendered entirely immaterial the charge governing the costs of the case under the defendant's tender of the lesser amount.

2. The verdict was warranted by the evidence, there being positive testimony by the plaintiff both as to the amount of cotton due under the contract as rental and the market value thereof when the rent became due.

Judgment affirmed.

J. J. WILLIAMSON & CO. v. MORGAN.
(No. 11987.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
April 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \S 173(6) — Defense is waived unless made by demurrer or plea, and cannot be set up for first time on appeal.

The statute of frauds is a personal defense, and, unless made by demurrer, plea, or answer, will be treated as having been waived. It cannot be set up for the first time in the Court of Appeals.

2. Frauds, statute of \S 115(3) — Written confirmation by party sought to be charged of previous verbal agreement is sufficient.

Where "the party to be charged therewith" admits, in a signed, written confirmation, the making by him of a previous verbal agreement complete in all the usual elements of a contract, this constitutes a compliance with the statute of frauds.

3. Contracts \S 10(1, 4) — Contract confirmed by seller in writing not unilateral; contract must have two or more parties and be binding on all.

A verbal contract was entered into, showing the sale and purchase of a specified number of bales of cotton of a definite grade and at a definite price, delivery to be made according to the prevailing custom in ten days after the date of the sale, and immediately after the verbal contract was made a written confirmation thereof was signed by the seller and delivered to the purchaser and accepted by him. The contract was not unilateral, as being only an offer or promise to sell the cotton, but it was an executed contract of sale, with constructive delivery of the cotton, and was mutually binding.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. Frauds, statute of \S 144 — Defendant's admission of contract when sued held to take it out of statute.

Where defendant, sued on a contract for the sale of cotton, by his plea admitted making the contract and confirming it in writing and the consideration therefor, and claimed a breach on the part of plaintiff, this, in itself, was sufficient to take the contract out of the statute.

Error from City Court of Polk County; John L. Tison, Judge.

Action by J. J. Williamson & Co. against J. A. Morgan. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

In this suit J. J. Williamson & Co. sought to recover as damages the difference between the contract price and the market price in the purchase and sale of 150 bales of cotton alleged to have been purchased by them from the defendant, J. A. Morgan. The facts, briefly stated, make the following case:

Both parties were engaged in the business of buying and selling cotton. On October 22, 1918, the plaintiffs' agent, at Rockmart, bought for them from the defendant, by a parol contract, 150 bales of cotton, and the contract was confirmed by the defendant on the same day, by letter, as follows:

"Rockmart, Ga., Oct. 22, 1918. Messrs. J. J. Williamson & Co., Atlanta, Ga.—Dear Sirs: Beg to confirm the sale of 150 bales of cotton sold to you to-day at 37½ basis Atlanta 4's Atlanta grades and differences, f. o. b. Rockmart. Yours truly, J. A. Morgan."

No actual date of delivery of the cotton is fixed by the contract. The evidence of the plaintiffs shows, however, that in the territory where this contract was made it was the custom for the purchaser to take up deliveries within ten days after purchase, and, according to their agent, the seller knew, at the time of making the contract, that the purchasers, through their agent, would not take the cotton for some days, as the agent was then leaving Rockmart to inspect and receive cotton bought at other points. On the afternoon of October 27, five days afterwards, the plaintiff in Atlanta called up the defendant over the telephone, and asked what date would be agreeable to deliver and pay for the cotton. The defendant answered that the time for such delivery would expire that day at sundown; and that if the cotton were not called for and paid for before that time the trade would be off. It was then too late for the plaintiffs to reach Rockmart by any train that afternoon, and the defendant was notified that the plaintiffs considered the trade still binding and would call for the cotton the next day and their agent went by the next morning's train with the money to receive and pay for the cotton. On arriving at Rockmart the agent found that the defendant had already sold the cotton and was in the act of delivering it to another party, and refused to carry out the contract with the plaintiffs. The evidence is uncontradicted that the difference in the contract price and the market price was $1,312.50, for which amount the suit was brought. According to the testimony of the plaintiffs' agent, he asked the defendant at Rockmart if he (the defendant) was offering any cotton that day, and the defendant announced that he had offered 150 bales at 37½ cents that day, and the agent asked if the defendant would allow him to make that offer if the other party did not take it.

The agent testified:

After a while "he said I might make the offer. I went over to the hotel and offered it to my house at 37½ cents and they took it. I went back and told him they would take it and wrote out a confirmation. I gave it to him and he said it was all right."

This refers to the confirmation heretofore set out in full in this statement. The defendant in his testimony admitted substantially the facts as stated above. He admitted the sale of the cotton, the confirmation of the sale of the cotton, and all that took place subsequently, but denied that there was a custom to give ten days for delivery by the seller to the purchaser of the cotton bought; stating that he did not know of any such custom, but that usually, in making sales in Rockmart, time was specified for delivery, unless the cotton was taken up at the time of the sale, and as to this sale it was understood by the plaintiffs' agent and himself that the 150 bales of cotton which had been sold on October 22 would be taken up "any time during the week or any time during the day of October 28, Tuesday." There was no mention of any custom or reasonable time to take up the cotton. At the conclusion of the evidence, on motion of the defendant, a nonsuit was awarded.

The plaintiffs' motion for a new trial, based upon the usual general grounds, was overruled, and they excepted.

E. S. Ault, of Cedartown, and Frank A. Hooper & Son, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Mundy & Watkins, of Cedartown, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). Counsel for the plaintiffs and the defendant differ as to the grounds upon which the nonsuit was based, counsel for the plaintiffs insisting that the only ground upon which the motion for a nonsuit was made and the only ground that was considered by the court was that the contract sued upon was unilateral, and counsel for the defendant insisting that it was also insisted by the defendant that the contract was not in writing as required by the statute of frauds and falls within section 3222 of the Civil Code 1910, which is a codification of that statute.

[1] Whatever may be the fact as to this, the record shows that the statute of frauds was not properly before the trial court. It has been frequently held in this state that the statute of frauds must be set up in the trial court by a special plea, and that the defendant waives this defense if it is not expressly pleaded. Marks v. Talmadge, 8 Ga. App. 559, 69 S. E. 1131, and cases cited.

[4] Another reason why the statute of frauds was not in the case in the court below and is not in it here is that the defendant's plea admits the making of the contract, admits the confirmation of the contract by him in writing, admits the consideration of the contract, and claims a breach upon the part of the plaintiff in not taking up or receiving the cotton and paying for it within the period alleged by the defendant; and this would be sufficient of itself to take the case out of the operation of the statute of frauds. Capital City Brick Co. v. Atlanta Ice Co., 5 Ga. App. 443, 63 S. E. 562, and decisions cited.

[2] Still another reason why the judgment of nonsuit was not based upon the statute of frauds is the fact, shown by the record, that the statute of frauds was complied with by the defendant, who was the party to be charged. The statute of frauds does not require that the contract shall be signed by both parties to the contract. The statute of frauds provides that, to make the obligations there mentioned binding on the promisor, the promise must be in writing, "signed by the party charged therewith, or some person by him lawfully authorized." Civil Code, § 3222. In other words, it is not necessary that both parties shall sign the contract to bring it within the statute, but only that the party sought to be bound by it shall have signed it. The contract might be created by a verbal agreement, and, if subsequently recognized in writing signed by the party to be charged therewith, showing that the contract created orally was in fact made, the statute would be complied with, provided, of course, that it be shown by the subsequent writing or series of writings that the contract was made and was fully intelligible without parol evidence. Capital City Brick Co. v. Atlanta Ice Co., supra. The evidence in this case shows that the defendant admitted the creation of the contract to which the agent of the plaintiffs testified, and that almost contemporaneously therewith the defendant, the party to be charged, confirmed the parol contract explicitly and fully, and the confirmation showed an agreement coextensive with the stipulations of the parol contract.

[3] Was the contract unilateral? This expression, frequently used by the courts and the text-writers, is a contradiction in terms. A contract must have two or more parties in full accord as to all of its terms, and must be binding upon all parties thereto. A writing or paper alleged to be a contract, binding only upon one party and not binding the other, is not a contract at all. It is simply "a scrap of paper." Parties to a contract may not be bound in the same way or to the same extent, but each party to the contract must be bound according to the terms of the contract, and, of course, in all contracts a consideration is a necessary condition precedent to the legality of the contract, although a promise is a valid consideration for a promise. Leaving out of the question therefore the statute of frauds, and not confusing it with the subsequent grounds of discussion, does the evidence show a valid contract in this case, or does the evidence merely show an offer to make a contract, which could be withdrawn by the offerer at any time prior to the other party doing some act which will bind him? It is insisted by the defendant that there was no binding contract, because the plaintiffs were not bound; that he entered into the obligation to sell the cotton, but that the plaintiffs made no obligation to pay for it or to take it when it was offered, and therefore the contract was not mutual.

Here there was no promise to sell cotton and no promise to take the cotton in the future, but there was a positive present sale of 150 bales of cotton by the defendant to the plaintiffs, through the agent of the plaintiffs, at a definite price and of a definite grade. In other words, it was a cash sale of spot cotton. True, there was no delivery of the cotton, but, according to the plaintiffs' evidence, there was a custom existing in the territory that a delivery made within ten days was a full compliance with that feature of the contract. Immediately after this parol contract was entered into it was confirmed in writing specifically identifying the parol contract in all its terms, and this confirmation by the defendant was delivered to the plaintiffs and accepted by them. Both parties to the contract were bound by its terms; one to deliver the cotton so sold, within ten days, to the purchasers and the other to receive and pay for the cotton when delivered or when offered within ten days. Could it be doubted that the obligation to accept and pay for it according to the terms of the contract was binding upon the purchasers, as well as that the obligation to deliver within ten days was binding upon the seller?

Without extending this discussion, we think that under the evidence in this case the contract upon which the suit is predicated was first created as a parol contract to which both parties assented; that the confirmation in writing subsequently made by the defendant and accepted by the plaintiffs did not affect the nature of the contract, but simply furnished evidence of its previous oral creation; and that the contract was binding upon both parties, provided the jury on the trial of the case should find that there existed a general custom relating to the sale of cotton in that territory which gave ten days to the purchaser to receive and pay for the cotton, and that if the plaintiffs did actually offer to receive it and pay for it within ten days, the custom existing, it was a duty, arising under the contract, for the defendant to deliver the cotton and accept the money. After the cotton had been purchased by the plaintiffs through their agent, and before the expiration of the ten days, if it had been offered to them by the defendant and they had refused to accept it and pay for it, can it be doubted that they would have been responsible to the plaintiff for any damages resulting from such breach of the contract? Not only had the plaintiffs and the defendant made the contract, but the plaintiff had asked the defendant for a written confirmation of the contract, which confirmation was made by him and accepted by them; and if after these things were done they had refused to receive the cotton and pay for it, if tendered within ten days by the defendant, relying upon his contract with them, and the price of cotton had gone down in the meantime, he could have recovered for their breach of the contract.

The case should have been submitted to the jury, and the court erred in granting a nonsuit and refusing to grant the plaintiffs' motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Criminal law §1129(1)—Error on exceptions pendente lite must be assigned on exceptions, and not on judgment complained of.

Before exceptions pendente lite can be considered by the appellate court, error must have been assigned in the main bill of exceptions on the exceptions pendente lite, and not merely on the judgment complained of in the exceptions pendente lite, or such an assignment must be made by the permission of the court before the argument of the case in the appellate court.

2. Master and servant §67—Offense under Labor Contract Act properly defined by charge.

In a prosecution for violation of the Labor Contract Act of 1908, court did not err in charging the jury that "the intent to defraud must have existed at the time the money was advanced before the defendant would be guilty under this section; before you would be authorized to find the defendant guilty, you would have to believe that the money charged in this accusation, $3, was received by the defendant in this case, at the time he did receive it, with the intent to defraud the prosecutor."

3. Criminal law §762(3)—Charge held not to express opinion of court.

In a prosecution for violation of the Labor Contract Act, an instruction that, before the jury would be authorized to find the defendant guilty, they would have to believe that the money charged in the accusation, "$3, was received by the defendant in this case, at the time he did receive it," with the intent to defraud the prosecutor, was not erroneous, in that court expressed an opinion to the jury as to what had been proven by using the phrase "$3, was received by the defendant in this case, at the time he did receive it."

4. Master and servant §67—Evidence insufficient to show violation of Labor Contract Act.

In a prosecution for violation of the Labor Contract Act of 1908, the burden of proving that the accused did not have good cause for his failure to carry out his contract is upon the state, and this burden is not carried by the testimony of the hirer that the accused had no good and sufficient reason for not performing the services agreed on, or for not returning the articles of value advanced by the hirer on the strength of the contract, such testimony amounting to a mere opinion or conclusion, and is worthless, unless supported by proof of sufficient facts to give it probative value.

Error from City Court of Sparta; R. H. Lewis, Judge.

Mack Crayton was convicted of a violation of the Labor Contract Act, and brings error. Reversed.

The defendant, in his amended motion for a new trial, contended that the court erred in charging the jury as follows:

"The intent to defraud must have existed at the time the money was advanced before the defendant would be guilty under this section; before you would be authorized to find the defendant guilty, you would have to believe that the money charged in this accusation, $3, was received by the defendant in this case, at the time he did receive it, with the intent to defraud the prosecutor."

He also contended that the court erred in giving said charge, for the reason that, in so doing, the court expressed an opinion to the jury as to what had been proven, by using in said excerpt of the charge the phrase, "$3, was received by the defendant in this case, at the time he did receive it."—Statement by editor.

G. L. Dickens, of Sparta, for plaintiff in error.

BROYLES, C. J. [1] 1. Before exceptions pendente lite can be considered by this court, error must have been assigned in the main bill of exceptions upon the exceptions pendente lite, and not merely upon the judgment complained of in the exceptions pendente lite, or such an assignment must be made, by the permission of this court, before the argument of the case here. Ponder v. State, 25 Ga. App. 768, 105 S. E. 318, and authorities cited. Under this ruling the bill of exceptions in the instant case contained no proper assignment of error upon the exceptions pendente lite, and they therefore cannot be considered.

[2, 3] 2. The amendment to the motion for a new trial is without merit.

[4] 3. In a prosecution for violation of the "Labor Contract Act" of 1903 (Penal Code 1910, § 715), the burden of proving that the accused did not have good cause for his failure to carry out his contract is upon the state; and this burden is not carried by the testimony of the hirer that the accused had no good and sufficient reason for not performing the services agreed upon, or for not returning the articles of value advanced by the hirer upon the strength of the contract. Such testimony amounts to a mere opinion or conclusion of the witness, and is worthless, unless supported by proof of sufficient facts to give it probative value. Ashley v. State, 22 Ga. App. 626, 97 S. E. 82. Under this ruling, and the facts of the instant case, the verdict was not authorized by the evidence, and the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Where personal property is delivered to the buyer under a written contract of conditional sale, which is duly attested and recorded as required by Civ. Code 1910, §§ 3318, 3319, the legal title does not vest in the purchaser until payment of the purchase price.

2. Sales \S 473(2)—Property sold conditionally held subject to attachment in action for price, notwithstanding sale to third person.

Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co.*, 144 Ga. 694, 87 S. E. 891), and where such purchaser sold the property, and absconded without paying any portion of the purchase price, and an attachment for the purchase money was issued and levied, and a claim was filed by one to whom the first purchaser has sold the property, and on the trial of the claim case these facts appeared without contradiction, the court did not err either in overruling the motion "to direct a verdict in favor of the claimant and dismiss the levy of the attachment," or in thereafter directing the jury to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, finding the property subject. The plaintiff in error cites and relies on the decision in the case of McNabb v. Brice, 120 Ga. 747, 48 S. E. 199. In that case, as shown by the record in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court, the note given for the purchase money of the property, and in which it was sought to retain the title thereto, was never recorded.

- Criminal law \S 959 — Denial of continuance and dismissal of motion for new trial because defendant not ready held not error.

BLOODWORTH, J. The plaintiff in error filed an extraordinary motion for a new trial, alleging, in part, that on June 14, 1920, he was tried and convicted of a misdemeanor; that during the same term of the court he filed a motion for a new trial on the general grounds; that on November 5 his motion for a new trial was dismissed; that "the reason that he did not prepare and file a brief of evidence in said case prior to the time it was dismissed was that the state's counsel had a part of the evidence which was adduced on the trial of the case, and would not produce the same, and movant was unable to prepare and file a brief of evidence without the documentary evidence introduced in said case, which was held in possession of counsel for the state"; that he did not have any notice of the date fixed for the hearing by the court when the original motion was dismissed; and that the alleged errors complained of in the original motion have never been determined by the court. In the extraordinary motion it was prayed "that state's counsel be required to turn over to movant, for the purpose of preparing and filing said brief, the documentary evidence adduced on the trial of said cause." This extraordinary motion for a new trial was set for a hearing at 9 o'clock a. m. on January 8, 1921. At that time the defendant's counsel moved for a continuance, on the ground that he was not ready for the hearing, and the court refused the continuance, and on the same day passed the following order:

"The within and foregoing motion coming on for a hearing, and, no brief of evidence having been filed and approved, the within motion is hereby dismissed."

Held, that the court did not err in overruling the motion for a continuance or in dismissing the extraordinary motion for a new trial.

Bennet & Branch, of Quitman, and Merrill & Moore, of Thomasville, for plaintiff in error.

B. B. Earle, of Thomasville, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. [1, 2] This is a suit for the value of a cow, which died while in the hands of the defendant carrier. In support of its special plea, the carrier sought to overcome the presumption of liability against it by showing, from circumstantial evidence, that the cow must have died on account of injuries inflicted by another animal belonging to the plaintiff and shipped in the same car. In our opinion the evidence thus adduced, while strong, did not absolutely demand such a conclusion. Although the conductor of the train testified that "some of the animals in the car were fighting," he "did not notice which one was the aggressor or the victim." There was evidence that the cow "had an ugly gash in the back of her flank, of the sort that could have been made by another animal's horn." One witness also testified that the cow died, "he is satisfied, from the injury in her flank"; but this witness was not an expert, and testified only by way of opinion, after refreshing his recollection from records made at the time of the occurrence, about a year previous; and neither this witness nor any other witness gives any sort of evidence as to the depth, nature, or character of this wound. Besides, there was evidence from defendant's witnesses that the knees of the cow, "both front and back," were "skinned and bruised, and one of her hips skinned," which tended to disprove the carrier's evidence to the effect that there were no unusual jerks or jars or anything in the handling of the train which could have caused the injury, and to support the theory of the plaintiff that negligence in this respect contributed to the death of the animal. Furthermore, while the defendant sought to remove the presumption against it by showing the absence of unusual and unnecessary jolts and jars in the handling of its car, no evidence was adduced for the purpose of showing diligence in loading and unloading the animal, in furnishing a proper car and equipment, and in the attention given it while in the hands of the defendant carrier.

ROSE & DASHER v. TAYLOR, LOWENSTEIN & CO. (No. 11808.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
April 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Pleading \S 231—Plaintiff entitled to amend by adding new count on same cause of action.

If the original petition contain enough to amend by, a plaintiff may, at any stage of the cause, as matter of right, amend his petition by adding another and separate count based upon the same cause of action. Civil Code 1910, §§ 5681-5683; Maxwell v. Harrison, 8 Ga. 61 (2), 52 Am. Dec. 385; Gainesville Ry. Co. v. Austin, 122 Ga. 823, 824(3), 50 S. E. 983; Cooper v. Portner Brewing Co., 112 Ga. 894 (3), 900, 38 S. E. 91; Southern Ry. Co. v. Chambers, 126 Ga. 404(5), 55 S. E. 37, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 926; National Surety Co. v. Farmers' Bank, 145 Ga. 461(1), 89 S. E. 581; 81 Cyc. 409; 6 Stand. Enc. Procedure, 710.

2. Pleading \S 225(2) — Disallowance of amendment setting up new count conforming to court's construction of contract in deciding demurrer held error.

Where, in order to prevent a dismissal of the plaintiffs' petition, under an order of the court sustaining a demurrer, setting up a different construction of the contract sued on, the plaintiffs tendered an amendment, as permitted by the order of the court and conforming to the court's construction of the contract, but made in the form of a second and independent count, it was error to disallow such an amendment and dismiss the petition, where the construction of the contract as thus sued on was the proper and correct one. In such a case it is unnecessary to determine whether or not, after offering such an amendment, as in compliance with the court's order on the demurrer, the plaintiffs might not only complain that the court erred in dismissing the petition as amended by the second count, but also that the petition was good on the original count. See Glover v. Savannah Ry. Co., 107 Ga. 34(3), 32 S. E. 876; Farrer v. Edwards, 144 Ga. 553(1), 87 S. E. 777; McConnell v. Frank E. Block Co., 26 Ga. App. —, 106 S. E. 617; Gainesville Ry. Co. v. Austin, 127 Ga. 120(1), 56 S. E. 254; Hay v. Collins, 118 Ga. 243(2), 44 S. E. 1002; Southern Ry. Co. v. Chambers, 126 Ga. 404(5), 55 S. E. 37, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 926; National Surety Co. v. Farmers' Bank, 145 Ga. 461, 467, 89 S. E. 581.

3. Sales \S 76—Contract construed as to price in case of delay in furnishing cars.

The court did not err in its construction of the contract, but erred in refusing to allow the proffered amendment by which the plaintiffs sought to add to the petition a count in accordance with such construction, and in dismissing the petition.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by Rose & Dasher against Taylor, Lowenstein & Co. Judgment dismissing the petition, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Plaintiffs filed a declaration in attachment to recover the purchase price of a tank car of turpentine shipped to the defendants under a written contract. The amount claimed was "eight cents per gallon in bulk below the official closing, Savannah, Georgia, market * * * on date of bill of lading," June 6, 1919, when the "full tank" car was "loaded" and delivered to the carrier at Bannockburn, Ga., for shipment to the defendants at Savannah. The clauses of the contract upon which plaintiffs rely are as follows:

"Place of Delivery.—The turpentine to be delivered into tank cars of the buyer * * * by the seller, all f. o. b. Bannockburn, Ga., free of expenses to the buyer."

"Price.—For turpentine to be eight cents per gallon in bulk, below the official closing Savannah, Ga., market * * * on date of bill of lading when full tank cars are loaded."

"Terms.—The buyer is to remit for proceeds of all shipments promptly after receipt of signed bills of lading and detailed weights."

Defendants demurred to the declaration as originally filed and as amended, upon the ground that the written contract, which was attached to the declaration, did not warrant a recovery of the amount sued for, viz. the market price of the turpentine based upon the Savannah market as of the date of the bill of lading issued when the car was loaded by plaintiffs, on June 6, 1919; but they claimed a lesser liability under other clauses of the contract, viz. the market price based on the Savannah market 10 days after the day they received written instructions from plaintiffs to furnish the tank car in question, which was the price on May 29, 1919. The clauses upon which defendants rely are as follows:

"Tank Cars: Empty tank cars are to be furnished by buyer within a reasonable time after written instructions are given that same are needed and can be loaded promptly. The ten days is to be considered a reasonable time, and if tank cars are not furnished within ten days, the price of said turpentine is to be based on the price of the tenth day after receipt of such written notice by the buyer."

The court construed the contract in accordance with defendants' construction, and sustained their demurrers, but with leave given the plaintiffs to amend the petition accordingly. The plaintiffs, within the prescribed time, tendered an amendment in the form of a second and independent count, conforming to the court's construction of the contract. The court disallowed the amendment and dismissed the petition.

Oliver & Oliver, of Savannah, and Dan R. Brice, of Valdosta, for plaintiffs in error.

Lawrence & Abrahams, of Savannah, for defendants in error.

JENKINS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-3] The language of the contract fixing the price of turpentine according to its quoted value on the tenth day after notice to furnish tank cars had been given must, in our opinion, not only be taken as the measure of damages for any negligent failure to promptly furnish the cars, but must also be taken and construed as an agreement fixing the price of the turpentine in accordance with the conditions and emergencies causing delays for which defendants might not be in any way responsible. While in some cases the market price based upon such 10-day period might be favorable to the defendants, it is just as likely that such an agreement would operate in favor of the plaintiffs. It is not alleged that the delay in furnishing the car was occasioned by any fraud, or even by negligence, of the defendants, and it may have resulted from the act of some third party. So far as the record discloses, the situation arising from the delayed arrival of the car was simply such as was naturally to be anticipated, and as appears to have been in the minds of the parties when the agreement was entered upon.

1. Criminal law §1084(6)—Motion for new trial, complaining of court's examination of witness, held too vague.

A motion for a new trial, complaining that after a witness for defendant had been examined and cross-examined and excused the judge "asked several questions of the said witness, being an unusual practice," was too vague and indefinite to raise anything for consideration in the Court of Appeals.

2. Criminal law §935(2)—New trial improperly denied when evidence insufficient.

This ground is too vague and indefinite to raise any question for the consideration of this court.

JACKSON v. STATE. (No. 12013.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 8, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Criminal law §768(1)—Charge as to effect of plea of not guilty on two counts of indictment held not misleading.

In a prosecution for forgery under an indictment in two counts charge that defendant's plea of not guilty has the effect of defendant saying, "He is not guilty under either count, and that makes the issue for you to determine whether he is guilty under the first count, or whether he is guilty under the second count, or whether he may be guilty under one count and not guilty under the other count," held not misleading as instructing jury to find him guilty under one count or the other.

2. Forgery §48—Charge that conviction might be had under count setting out unindorsed check, though evidence showed an indorsed check held not error.

In a prosecution for forgery under an indictment in two counts, the first setting out an indorsed check and the second an unindorsed check, charge that conviction might be had on second count, if check in evidence corresponded in all particulars with that set out in the second count, except that check was indorsed, held not error.

3. Criminal law §1178—Grounds of motion for new trial, not argued, not considered.

In a prosecution for forgery, grounds of the motion for a new trial, not argued, will not be considered on writ of error.

Error from Superior Court, Barrow County; Andrew J. Cobb, Judge.

Roy Jackson was convicted of forgery, with recommendation that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, and he brings error. Affirmed.

The amended motion for new trial, as to grounds considered by the court, was as follows:

(4) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows:

"To this indictment Roy Jackson enters his plea of not guilty. He, at this time, is alone on trial. The effect of that plea is that he says that he is not guilty under either count, and that makes the issue for you to determine, whether he is guilty under the first count, or whether he is guilty under the second count, or whether he may be guilty under one count and not guilty under the other count. His general plea of not guilty makes the issue with the state, which he says is not guilty at all under either count."

This charge was error for the following reasons:

(a) Its wording was so confused and ambiguous that the said charge did not clearly present to the jury the issues to be tried in said case, nor give to them any proper instructions as to what issue they were to determine in this case.

(b) The language of said charge was such that in effect it instructed the jury that the defendant was guilty of at least one of the offenses charged in the indictment, and the only question submitted to the jury by said charge was whether the defendant should be found guilty of either one or more of the offenses charged in the indictment; said charge absolutely excluding from the jury the question of the defendant's innocence of all of the offenses charged in the presentment. In other words, the effect of the said charge was to direct a verdict of "guilty," and leaving the only issue to be determined by the jury whether he was guilty of only one or more of the offenses charged in the indictment.

(c) The said charge was error, for the reason that it instructed the jury "that the defendant said his plea of not guilty made the issue with the state that he was not guilty at all under either count in the indictment, but did not instruct the jury that this was really the issue made by said plea; in other words, the said charge instructed the jury that the defendant himself said that such was the effect of his plea of not guilty, but did not even intimate that the court instructed the jury that this claim of the defendant was a correct or proper claim. Nowhere in his charge did the court correct the errors above alleged, by proper instructions to the jury."

(7) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows:

"Now, gentlemen of the jury, you will find in the first count of the indictment that the check described therein is a check which is alleged in the indictment to have been indorsed, and you will determine whether the check which has been indorsed, in evidence before you, corresponds in all material particulars to the check which is described in the count. You will find that the check which is described in the second count is not described as having been indorsed, and if you find that the check, which was indorsed, in evidence before you, corresponds with the check which is described in the second count in all particulars, except that the check as described in the second count does not refer to the indorsement, I charge you there still may be a conviction under the second count, if the check in evidence before you corresponds in all other particulars with the check described; that the indorsement of the check would not be a material matter under the allegations in the second count."

The above set forth charge was error, for the reason that the indorsement on the check was a material matter under the allegations in the second count in the indictment, and the fact that the indictment in its second count described an unindorsed check, and the check offered in the evidence was an indorsed check, constituted a material and fatal variance between the allegations of the second count of said indictment and the said check introduced as evidence to support said count of said indictment.

Lewis C. Russell and Jos. D. Quillian, both of Winder, for plaintiff in error.

W. O. Dean, Sol. Gen., of Monroe, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1-3] The court did not err in charging the jury as complained of in grounds 4 and 7 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial. The other grounds of the motion are not argued. There is evidence to support the verdict, and the judgment is affirmed.

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Bills and notes \S 365(1)—Equities between original parties not good against innocent holder for value.

In an action on a note by an innocent holder for value, evidence showing equities existing between the maker and the original payee was properly excluded.

2. Bills and notes \S 369—That promise to pay was conditional cannot be shown against innocent holder.

In an action on a note by an innocent holder for value, the maker cannot testify to a state of facts rendering the note a conditional promise to pay.

3. Bills and notes \S 370—Failure of consideration no defense against innocent holder.

In an action on a note by an innocent holder for value, a failure of consideration is not a defense.

Action by F. L. Stevens against E. T. Parks. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

H. V. Johnson and B. P. Gaillard, Jr., both of Gainesville, for plaintiff in error.

Joseph G. Collins, of Gainesville, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. In this case the maker of the note sued on sought to set up a defense which might have been good against the original payee, but was not good as against an innocent bona fide holder for value. The court excluded evidence which undertook to show equities existing between the maker and the original payee.

[1-3] Held: It was not error to exclude such evidence. The maker of the note could not, as against the holder who was suing, and who by the evidence was shown to be an innocent holder for value, testify to a state of facts which would render the note a conditional promise to pay. If there was a failure of consideration in the note, the subsequent taker, the plaintiff in this case, in the court below, was protected against such defense. See Burch v. Pope, 114 Ga. 334 (1), 40 S. E. 227. It was not error for the court to direct a verdict against the defendant for the sum sued for.

Judgment affirmed.

Railroads \S 51/2, New, vol. 6A, Key-No. Series—Amendment by striking name of director general and substituting company held improperly disallowed.

In an action against the director general of railroads for an injury occurring prior to the federal operation of railroads, where the petition and process were served both on the director general and the railroad company, and the petition as amended alleged a cause of action against the company, a proposed amendment to the process striking the name of the director general and substituting the name of the company as defendant was improperly disallowed.

HILL, J. When an injury occurred to an employee of the Central of Georgia Railway Company prior to the date of the President's proclamation and the Act of Congress of March 21, 1918 (Comp. St. 1918, Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115¼a-3115¼p), placing the railroads of the country into the hands of a Director General for operation, and subsequently, while the Central of Georgia Railway Company, in pursuance of the terms of the said proclamation and act, was in the possession and control of the Director General, suit was brought by the injured employee of the corporation against the Director General of Railroads, to recover damages for the injuries received during his employment by the corporation, and the allegations of the petition, after an amendment had been allowed striking the Director General's name as defendant, set forth a cause of action for the injury against the railway corporation. and petition and process were served both upon the Director General and the railway company, although the process was directed to the former alone, it was error not to allow an amendment to the process, presented by the plaintiff, striking the name of the Director General and substituting as the defendant the name of the railway corporation as the defendant, the suit being in effect one against said corporation. *Robinson v. Exchange of property \S 11—Right to rescind dependent on agreement or existence of fraud; deaf mule not "sound and all right," within agreement for exchange.

"The right to rescind a horse swap exists only by virtue of such special terms of the contract of sale as may so authorize, or, in the absence of any such agreement, by reason of knowingly false and fraudulent misrepresentation of existing facts, made to the complaining party, whereby he was induced to act to his injury." *Barnett v. E. 1054; Stovall & Strickland v. McBrayer, 20 Ga. App. 93, 92 S. E. 543. Under these principles of law, the verdict for the plaintiff was authorized by the evidence.

Error from City Court of Greensboro; Jos. P. Brown, Judge.

Action by J. T. King against D. H. Bowden. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The exceptions entered by the defendant are on the general grounds only. According to the plaintiff's evidence, he and the defendant had exchanged mules upon the express agreement that, if the defendant's mule "was not sound and all right, it was no trade," and that, in the event the mule received by the plaintiff in exchange failed to come up to these requirements, then the mule which he had delivered to the defendant was to be again his, and vice versa. The mule received by the plaintiff proved to be deaf, and, immediately on his discovery of such defect, plaintiff sought to restore the original status. The only contention made in the brief of counsel for defendant in defense of the suit, as based on this agreement, is that the deafness of the mule could not be accounted "unsoundness," or be taken as such a defect as would prevent the animal from being considered "sound and all right."

Criminal law \S 1160—Verdict, supported by evidence and approved by trial judge, not disturbed.

Where there was evidence to support the verdict, and it was approved by the trial judge, the judgment overruling a motion for a new trial must be affirmed.

Geo. M. Du Bose, Sol., of Washington, Ga., for the State.

LUKE, J. This case is here for review upon the ground that the evidence does not authorize the verdict. Upon conflicting evidence the jury convicted the defendant, Anderson, of having in his possession a pistol, not at his home or place of business, within the meaning of the statute—Park's Ann. Pen. Code, § 348(a)—without first having procured a license from the ordinary. There being evidence to support the verdict, and the verdict being approved by the trial judge, the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial must be affirmed.

WIGGINS v. L. JONAS & CO. (No. 11829.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
April 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Attachment \Leftrightarrow 243—Party moving to dismiss must point out defects in bond.

Where a defendant in attachment moves to dismiss the attachment proceeding on the ground that plaintiff's bond is void, he must specifically point out its defects.

2. Attachment \Leftrightarrow 243—Objections to bond on motion to dismiss held too general.

On motion to dismiss an attachment proceeding, objections on the ground that the law has not been complied with by plaintiff before the issuance of the attachment as to the giving of the necessary bond and because the paper purporting to be a bond is not sufficient under the law are too general.

3. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1052(8)—Admission of evidence harmless when plaintiff's case supported by undisputed evidence.

The admission of letters in evidence, even if erroneous, was harmless where plaintiff made out its case by other competent testimony, and defendant offered no evidence in denial of her liability.

JENKINS, P. J. [1, 2] 1. Where a defendant in attachment moves to dismiss the attachment proceeding, upon the ground that the bond given by the plaintiff is void, he must specifically point out its defects. English v. Reed, 97 Ga. 477, 478, 25 S. E. 325. The record in the instant case fails to set forth any specific ground of objection to the bond. The grounds urged in the lower court were as follows:

(1) "Because the law has not been complied with by plaintiff before the issuance of said attachment as to the giving of the necessary bond"; and (2) "because the paper purporting to be a bond, copy of which bond is attached hereto marked Exhibit B, upon which the attachment issued, is not sufficient under the law and is ineffective as a bond under the law."

Under the authority cited such general objections must be held insufficient.

[3] 2. The defendant having offered no evidence in denial of her liability upon the open account sued on, and as the plaintiff's evidence made out its case by competent testimony, thus undisputed, irrespective of the copy letters, to the introduction of which exception was taken, their admission, even if not proper, must be treated as harmless. The objection raised to the express receipts, upon the ground that they were not identified with the goods sold to the defendant, is not sustained by the evidence disclosed by the record.

Judgment affirmed.
